Daniel and Rebecca had lived most of the time with their son Nathan until she died March 18, 1813, after this time Daniel lived most of his remaining days at his daughter's, Jamima Callaway, until a few days before his death at his son Nathan's home, where he died on the 26th day of September, 1820, in his 86th year. They were buried in the David Bryan cemetery near Jamima's home.

In 1845 their remains were removed to Frankfort, Ky., for burial there.

See a portrait of Daniel Boone from the only life painting ever made of him.

The Boone statue, carved from Bedford stone, is at the north end of the Boone Memorial Bridge. The old Sycamore at the Boone Spring, fell Oct. 6, 1932. They say 3 or 4 persons could stand in the hollow of the old Sycamore.
The baby elm now grows near where the old elm was cut down 1828.

Fort Boonesborough, Ky., 260 ft. long, 150 ft. wide, area three-quarters of an acre, is located on the S. E. side of Spring Creek which flows N. E. The east corner is 100 yds. from the High Bank of the Ky. River where the Indians tunnelled 40 yards to a cave-in which was 60 yards from the Fort.

Spring Creek Falls are at the High Bank, more water in the creek 100 years ago than now. The Spring is near the west corner. The Sycamore is 50 feet north of the spring, it fell Oct. 5, 1932 from the results of the wounds it received during the 10 days seige in 1778. The side toward the fort was so leadened that decay formed a shell that 4 or 5 persons could stand in the hollow before it fell. The Sycamore was the last of the 3 Big Trees touched by the hands of Henderson, Boone, Callaway and Kenton. The Sulphur Lick is at the N. W. gate. The baby Elm that now grows where the Mighty ELM grew is about 30 ft. from the W. corner and 30 ft. from the W. and S. line of the Fort. The axe-man would not spare the ELM. It was cut down 1828, more than 200 years old.

The Ferry was chartered in 1779 and the S. E. gate was then opened. The spring is 200 yds. from the High Bank and 300 yds. from the water in the river. The MEMORIAL is enclosed by a fifty foot square wall 4 ft. high. The East corner of the Fort is the East corner of the enclosure. The Fort has been in ruins for more than 100 years.

George Boon's stone ware-house at Exeter Sta., at the river landing one and half miles west of the Lincoln home, was built about 200 years ago, about the time the tp. road was built to the river from Stonersville. Observe the thick walls for protection. He owned a saw mill. I infer the other buildings lumber was used instead of stone and maybe his residence also as they are all gone in ruins. The shed roof was built about 50 years ago.

The New Boone History

George Boone born 1666, son George born 1690 England, son Josiah born Pa. 1726-7, died Glenn Creek 1814. Five miles south of Frankfort, Ky. married Hannah Hite 1750. Children, George, 1751, Noah, died young, Josiah, Jr., 1758.. Married second time Ellenor Boone, 1819. Jeremiah Boone, born Feb. 29, 1760, died 1832, married Joyce Nevil, May 9, 1787. (1768-1861). They signed a deed for their interest in their father's estate, Josiah, Sr., which is on record at Versailles, Ky. "Boone Bulletin" date of deed, July 29, 1819. Allison died young. Ruth born 1770, married Pluright Sisk, 1790; Deborah (twin) never married, Ruhemah married William Thompson. Hannah, born 1786, married James Barnhill 1800. Isaiah married Eliza Brown. I believe the last two were Josiah Jr's children. Heirs were George, Josiah Jr, Jeremiah, Ruth, Deborah, Ruhemah.

A Miss Johnson, descendant from same family as Andrew Johnson, married Mr. Joyce, daughter (Sarah Joyce), married (James) Nevil, their daughter Joyce Nevil married Jeremiah Boone, their daughter Charlotte gave me (1881), 50 years ago, the Joyce-Nevil family history.

James Nevil in 1779 went to Lincoln County, Ky. Found British and Indians on the war path and the settlers preparing for their first invasion into Ohio. They burned old Chillicothe, and captured a number of horses. Killed two chiefs and a few other Indians. Then Col. Bowman returned to Harrodsburg, Ky. The Indians came back again.

After the Bryan Station fight Aug. 15th and the Blue Licks bloody defeat, ambushed, tomahawked, scalped Aug. 19th, 1782 where more than a third of the men were killed, among them being Cols. Todd and Trigg, leaving Col. Daniel Boone in command, who ordered a retreat.

He rallied his men and called for volunteers, who enlisted by the hundreds among them being Capt. Sam Kirkham, his two young cousins, Josiah and Jeremiah Boone, who enlisted for the Expedition to join Gen. Clarke, (born 1752) who was coming from "The Falls" to pursue the Indians to their homes in Ohio. They were completely defeated. They never came to Kentucky again.

John Mayfield Sr., born Albemarle County, Va., 1745, died Pulaski, Ky., 1816. Entire Revolutionary war service. Last service with Gen. Daniel Morgan, Buckingham, Va. Clarinda Pleasants (1749-1821) married 1767. Their son John born 1768, died 1813, tree fell on him, married Mary Wolf, a pioneer doctor, Jan., 1790 (1770-1848). Her father Henry and Sr. Fort Washington, N. Y. Sr. killed. Reg. Col. Hart, Pa., son Reuben with Capt. Sam Tate, Maj. Taul, Gen. John E. King, and Governor Shelby at Thames, after war of 1812 Reuben married Charlotte Boone, my Grandmother, at Somerset, 1814.

James Nevil born Prince William County, Va., 1741, Revolutionary war, Col. Edmonds, Capt. Martin Pickett, Bureau of Pensions, Etc.

When James Nevil and family arrived at the little place Asaphs, (afterward changed to Stanford), they began to see familiar names: Col. Daniel Boone, the surveyor, Capt. Sam Kirkham on the Grand Jury, the name of Abraham Lincoln on the court record. Jeremiah Boone making visits to the Nevil home often. There was Capt. George Mayfield and Lieut. Isaac Mayfield with the troops. I served on the Grand Jury.

Jeremiah bought three farms on Pitman Creek, N. E. Somerset, 1800.

James Nevil and wife, and Jeremiah Boone and family lived neighbors on Dix River 1789-1796. James Nevil and Sarah his wife made a court deed at Harrodsburg, Ky., for land, early days.

With the above people and others James Nevil began his pioneer life.

DESCRIPTION

The crest is flesh colored hand grasping three steel arrows; links silver and blue; body blue; lions and large diagonal gold. The three shells red; name "Boone" in silver.

The Devonshire arms that came down to the Pa. Boones from older arms with minor changes so as to be able to identify the Boone descendants to which the arms belong.

The older arms—the description was: the shield is blue; the bend is silver; the cotises paralleling it of gold; the lions are silver; the escallop shells are of red; the hand and the arrows are of natural colorings.

Solomon Boone of Bradninch, Eng., records the above coat of arms in Bristol, Pa., in 1690. Both Crozier and Burke name the de Bohun arms authentic for the line of Boone or Boons of Eng., or their descendants in America.

BOONE-MAYFIELD NATURAL BRIDGE

George Boone III, Geo. IV, son William, married Sarah Lincoln sister of John, ancestor of President Lincoln, William's brother Josiah, Sr., son Jeremiah, daughter Charlotte married Reuben Mayfield, vet. 1812, John's son, at Somerset, Ky., Oct. 27, 1814. Son Nevel was given the land where the Natural Bridge is located. His daughter Mary Ferguson owns it at the present time. A trail is over the bridge but no road has ever been built which would save a long detour to get to the old Boone Home.

More than 80 years ago Reuben Mayfield gave a site for a school on top of the bridge so the pupils would not have to cross the creek.

James Neville's, Rev. war, daughter Joyce Neville married Jeremiah Boone, Rev. war 1787, Stanford, Ky. Gen. John of Va., was James Neville's brother who was with Col. Boone, Gen. Benj. Logan and Gen. G. R. Clark, all in Rev. war. Eleven Mayfields in the Rev. war. Col. John Tate, Rev. war, of Russell Co., Va., died 1828. All of his children migrated to Ky. except JOSEPH. Robert's daughter Mary married Milton Short, son of Wesley, son of John born 1756 Tigart Valley, W. Va., Rev. war, buried at Cem. No. 5. Milton's daughter Winnie married Alex. C. Mayfield, my father, Jan. 12, 1854, children: Ila born at J. A,, Mary Charlotte, No. 6, Reuben Newton, No. 7, Wesly Short and Inda born at Springville.

Sam Tate, Vet. 1812, married Jane Owens, her sister Rebecca married Wesly Short, daughters of Sgt. Wm. Owens, Rev. war.

No. 2 is the old Bridge Church. No. 3, where the creek runs under Buggers Point and forms the Dry Ford at No. 4. No. 6 is where lived John Short, Reuben, Alex. C. and Nevel Mayfield and Homer Ferguson. No. 7 where Wesly Short lived, here Owen was born. W. B. Bailey's son Ralph was born here. The white house was carried away by the McKinley Flood.

All of my ancestors had an English Coat-of-Arms. Solomon Boone recorded the Boone Arms in the records of Bristol, Pa., 1690. The Mayfield Coat-of-Arms was granted to Owen Mayfield, Mayor and Alderman of Cambridge, England, 1684. John and Robert Tate had been Lord Mayors of London in early days.

The Boones, the Shorts and de Nevilles, Fr., were followers of William the Conqueror. George Boone III. was Josiah, Sr. and Daniel Boone's grandfather. A short history of my ancestors I filed in Congress Library, 1901. In 1931-2-3, I wrote fifty chapters for Mt. Branch Vet. on the Life of Daniel Boone, all on file in Astor and Congress Libraries.

In 1934 I had made ten dozen portraits of Daniel Boone taken from the only life painting ever made of him. They were placed in all the large libraries of the country and in all the libraries along the Wilderness Road.

Hello,

The Vigo County Historical Society forwarded your letter of Dec. 9 to the library as they donated many of their materials to us several years ago. I did find the marriage of G. W. Boon and Emma Hall in Knox County, as you mentioned. I also found the marriage of John Boone and Louisa Suggs and the marriage supplement showing the names of John's parents. We don't have the actual Knox County marriage records, only the index.

When I checked the 1860 census, I found a 24 year old George W. Boone in Busseron Township, Knox County, page 779. His wife Lucinda was age 21, and a son Jno. T was eleven months. Also in the household were Amanda Boone, age 12; Mary A., age 11, and Jno. T., age 22. I suspect those were George's siblings. A 47 year old Lance Hall was living two houses away. He was born in Kentucky. The following people were also living in his household: Mariah, age 32; Jackson, age 14; Alfred, age 10; Albert, age 8; William, age 6; Mary, age 2; Ruth, age 75; Ann, age 30; and two farm laborers.

When I checked the 1870 census, I found Emma Boone in Busseron Township, Knox County, page 6. She was a 28 year old seamstress living in the household of John L. Mullins. Her children were John, 11; Laura, 9; Mary, 6; and Anna, 3. Also listed in the household were: Ann Mullins, 46; Margaret Hall, 18; Albert Hall, 17; William Hall, 15; Mary Hall, 11; and Harriet Hall, 9. Albert, William, and Mary were living with Lance Hall in 1860. A 28 year old James A. Hall lived near the Mullins.

I was puzzled by the wife named Lucinda or Emma, so I checked the 1850 census. I found Lance Hall in Knox County, page 156. In 1850 he was age 36 with a 28 year old wife Ann, and children Lucinda E., age 11; Jackson, age 3; and James A., age 2. Also in the household were Richmond Sandford, a 20 year old laborer, and 70 year old Rutha Hall. Note that ages were not consistent from one census to another. I believe that Emma's name was Lucinda Emma and that Lance was her father.

I did not find a Boon/Boone family on the 1850 Knox County census. There were several Boone families in Sullivan County, but none had a son George of the right age. You mentioned a Harrison County connection, and the 1850 Harrison County census does list a Craven Boone with a 13 year old son George. However, that George was still unmarried and living in Craven's household in 1860.

I checked the online Civil War Soldiers and Sailors System at www.itd.nps/gov/cwss/ and found two George Boones from Indiana. One was in Co. E of the 59th Infantry and one was in Co. H of the 97th Infantry. We have a copy of the eight volume Indiana adjutant general's report, and I checked the volumes for those regiments. The George who was in the 59th enlisted 14 Dec. 1861, but no residence or date of discharge was given. The man who was in the 97th enlisted 26 Aug. 1862 and died at Lagrange TN 19 March 1863. His residence was given as Stockton, which is in Owen County. You might want to order the service records of both men from the National Archives. I did notice one problem with the George who died in 1863. In 1870 Emma had a three year old daughter Anna, so her husband must have lived past 1863.

I think Lucinda or Emma can safely be connected with the Lance Hall family, but George's family is elusive. It appears that something must have happened to the parents before 1860 as George had possible siblings living with him. The problem is that the family doesn't seem to have been in Knox County in 1850.

If you would like copies of the census records and the adjutant general's report, send $2.00 to my attention at the Vigo County Public Library, One Library Square, Terre Haute IN 47807.

Remains May Be Those Of Squire Boone

Boone County

CENTRAL, Ind. (AP)—The remains of a human skeleton have been found by two youths searching for a legendary chamber beneath Squire Boone's "burial cave" near here.

Harrison County historians believe the remains may be those of the brother of Daniel Boone, the famous pioneer folk hero. The "burial cave" is believed to have been the site of Squire's burial in 1815. Arville L. Funk, historian-author from Corydon, said Squire was one of the first white settlers to migrate to Harrison County about 1800. However, he said many believe the man's remains now rest in an unmarked grave in Boone Cemetery on the Fort Knox Army Reservation.

The bones are presently being studied by Dr. Joseph Granger, director of the University of Louisville, Ky. Archeological Survey. Granger, who said the bones were more than 50 years old, plans to examine the bones for a week to ten days.

Daniel Boone

Boone Family - Genealogy File

Collectors Aware Of 250th Anniversary Of His Birth

by Glenn Kerfoot

When Daniel Boone was born into a pioneer family living among the Indians in a Pennsylvania wilderness in 1734, life seemingly held little promise. Yet, when he died in 1820 at the age of 85 he was one of the most famous men in the world. In the years since, his reputation has grown to epic proportions. Today he is the internationally-accepted symbol of America's buckskin-clad frontiersman and a bona fide folk hero. The 250th anniversary of his birth — observed this year on Nov. 2 — is certain to add to the lustre.

The life and legend of Daniel Boone has inspired hundreds of dramas, films, festivals, television and radio serials, books, poems, magazine and newspaper articles, drawings, paintings and statues. Annually, thousands of tourists tramp around his birthplace, his grave, his homes, and a host of towns, counties, trails, forts, caves, hotels, restaurants, camps, theaters, mountains, forests, and streams named in his honor — and each year the list of these grows longer.

His name or visage appears on coins, medals, postage stamps, cacheted covers, postcards, pennants, Boy Scout badges, patches, bumper stickers, books, brochures, prints, and other ephemera, all providing a bumper crop for collectors of Boone memorabilia and frontier Americana.

Born in Berks County, Pa. in 1734, he spent his boyhood years roaming the woods, hunting, fishing, trapping, and learning the ways of the friendly Indians. In 1750 he moved with his family to Virginia, then on to North Carolina three years later. In 1755 he accompanied General Edward Braddock's ill-fated military expedition to the Forks of Ohio.

In 1756 he married Rebecca Bryan and tried farming, but his real interests were hunting and exploring, and by 1763 he Kentucky, ranging far south as Florida. In 1775 he led a party which cut the famous Wilderness Road, built a fort named Boonesborough, and brought his family to Kentucky.

Throughout the Revolution Kentucky settlers were constantly harassed by the British and Indians, and in 1778 Boone was seized and taken to Detroit, presumably to be turned over to the British. However, Shawnee Chief Blackfish adopted him as a son and for several months he lived with the Indians, escaping only when he learned of a plot to destroy Boonesborough.

As a lieutenant-colonel in the Virginia Militia he served at the Battle of Blue Licks, Ky. in 1782.

After the war he tried farming, surveying, storekeeping, and land dealing without much success. Dismayed at the loss of lands he thought he owned, he moved to Virginia for a few years, then to Missouri in 1799 to serve as an official of the Spanish government.

After the United States purchased the Louisiana Territory in 1804 he was granted a tract on which he lived comfortably, devoting the final years of his life to salt-making and exploring the wilderness as far northwest as Oregon. He died Sept. 26, 1820, and was buried beside his wife at Marthasville, Mo. In 1845 his son had the remains dug up and shipped to Frankfort, Ky., for re-burial.

So much for the man, but what of the legend and the myths? This Daniel Boone was born in 1784 in the fertile imagination of John Filson, a Pennsylvania schoolmaster who published a book entitled The Discovery, Settlement and Present State of Kentucke. An appendix entitled The Adventures of Col. Daniel Boon was supposedly written by the explorer. A bestseller in the United States, Filson's book was re-published in England and on the continent, and overnight Boone became an international celebrity.

Helped along by poets, novelists and artists, the image of Boone as peerless leader, Indian fighter and woodsman matched by few in strength, courage and resourcefulness, grew and grew. In his poem "Don Juan", Lord Byron referred to "the General Boone, backwoodsman of Kentucky". In 1934 novelist Timothy Flint published The Memoirs of Daniel Boone; and James Fenimore Cooper's Leatherstocking Tales further glorified the larger-than-life frontiersman.

His enduring fame as both a historical character and a folk hero, sparked by today's increasing interest in our nation's past, has brought a renewed interest in Boone. In recent years the National Forest Service has opened to the public a crude wooden shelter supposedly built by Boone around 1769; the State of Kentucky has erected a pioneer-type log stockade at Boonesboro, site of the 1775 structure; and funds have been raised to restore Pilot Knob, the mountaintop from which Boone first looked out on Kentucky.

With the addition of these attractions, frontier Americana buffs can now retrace the old pioneer's earthly pilgrimage from his Pennsylvania birthplace to his graves in Missouri and Kentucky, accumulating along the way a colorful and fascinating collection of memorabilia.

At Birdsboro, Pa., the 600-acre Daniel Boone State Park contains all the land once owned by his father Squire as well as those of Joseph and Benjamin Boone. Sometime in the 18th century the original cabin was replaced with a two-story stone house which stands today. It is believed that his father built part of this house before leaving in 1750 since the foundations of the cabin form part of the foundation wall of the present building.

Nothing owned by the family remains, although a beautiful game pouch of leather, linen and wool, made for Daniel around 1780 is on loan from Pittsburgh's Carnegie Museum. Available to collectors are postcards and other printed material.

Daniel lived in North Carolina's Yadkin River valley for 22 years and his spirit is much in evidence today in the town that bears his name. A visitor to Boone can stop at the Daniel Boone Hotel, dine at the Dan'l Boone Inn, relax in the Daniel Boone native gardens, visit the Daniel Boone monument, play a round at the Boone Golf Club, and catch a performance of "Horn in the West", an outdoor drama about the pioneer shown nightly during the summer at the 3,000-seat Daniel Boone Amphitheater.

At Mocksville, in the old Joppa cemetery, are the graves of his parents, Squire and Sarah, with the original headstones enclosed in a protective monument. In Davidson County is Boone's Cave — one of many caverns named in his honor.

When Daniel first moved west in 1769 he entered Kentucky through the Cumberland Gap, now a national historical park. The Gap has exhibits and films telling the story of his role in the westward expansion. On hand are postcards, including one with Boone's portrait, a brochure explaining his visits to the area, and the Bakeless biography.

Among Boone's many claims to fame was the construction of the Wilderness Road across the Appalachians. Today he is remembered by Barbourville, Ky. — one of the towns that sprung up along the road — with a three-day Daniel Boone Festival held each October for more than 30 years.

In the central part of the state a visitor can see Boone's Hill at Berea, and Boone's Cave near Nicholasville; hike in the Daniel Boone National Forest; attend religious services at the Boone's Trace Baptist Church near Athens; and dine at the Boone Tavern in Berea.

In the forest is the tiny shelter constructed of field stones and red oak shakes discovered in 1959. Because of its age, distinctive construction, and a board with Boone's name carved on it found nearby, the forest rangers believe it may have been built by Boone to shelter him while he explored Kentucky between 1769 and 1771.

At Boonesboro on the Kentucky River is a reconstruction of Fort Boonesborough built by his party in 1775. Dedicated in 1974 and opened to the public the following year, the log stockade surrounds cabins in which skilled artisans demonstrate pioneer crafts.

Another reconstructed fort can be visited at Harrodsburg, site of Fort Harrod built in 1774. Visited frequently by Boone, it was the oldest permanent English settlement west of the Alleghenies.

DEERSKIN jacket that once belonged to Daniel Boone is now a proud possession of the Filson Club in downtown Louisville, Ky.

The outdoor drama "The Legend of Daniel Boone" plays here nightly during the summer.

Boone's grave is at Frankfort on a high bluff overlooking the capital city and the Kentucky River. His, and wife Rebecca's remains were interred here in 1845 after removal from their original graves in Missouri.

The Old State House Museum at Frankfort has many Boone relics. A popular item is "ol' tick-licker" a long rifle on which he carved his initials and the phrase "Boon's best fren." Sharing the spotlight is his powder horn, an 1845 re-burial program, and a pair of black gloves worn by a pallbearer. Inside the capitol building is a large mural showing the Boone party entering the state in 1769.

Kentucky's official bicentennial year insignia featured a buckskin-clad figure of Boone. As a result, he turned up on postcards, and many other items.

The figure on the bicentennial seal was adapted from a photograph of sculptor Enid Yandell's life-size statue of Boone standing at the entrance to the Louisville's Cherokee Park. A copy of the statue also stands on the campus of Eastern Kentucky University at Richmond.

Louisville's Filson Club, formed in 1884 to collect, preserve and publish historical material pertaining to Kentucky, owns a number of Boone relics. They include a rifle, hunting shirt, broadaxe, piece of bark with Boone's name carved on it, a portrait from life by artist Chester Harding, a copy of the Harding painting, and a copy of Filson's book that started the Boone legends.

Kentucky has a Boone County, a Booneville, and a Boone's Trace, and items from these places are sought by Boone collectors.

On a wooded hillside near Defiance, Mo., stands a rugged stone house as a lasting memorial to the folk hero. The Boones began construction of the house in 1803 and finished it in 1810. The Georgian-style structure on land granted him by Congress, was Daniel's home until he died in 1820. The house has been restored and furnished with furniture of the period, much of it donated by Boone descendants.

The house contains seven walnut mantels carved by Daniel, a sideboard made for him from his favorite walnut tree, a folding rocker, two large cabinets, his desk, bedspread, sun dial and powder horn. In the house are Rebecca Boone's butter churn, sewing basket, gloves, and many things owned by their children.

At Boonesboro, near Boonville, Mo., is Boone's Lick where Daniel and his son Nathan conducted a saltmaking enterprise from 1805 to 1811. The Missouri State Museum at Jefferson City displays a huge hammered iron kettle, made in France, used by the Boones in their salt industry.

At Rocheport, Mo., is Boone Cave; and at Leasburg is Onondaga Cave, both reportedly discovered and used by the Boones. The latter was the site of a reunion of Boone descendants in 1971. At Marthasville stands a granite boulder with a bronze plaque marking the original gravesite of Daniel and Rebecca. Missourians insist that Daniel's body is still there and that a stranger who died while visiting the Boones is interred at Frankfort, Ky.

Other Boone collectibles are commemorative half dollars minted in 1934 and 1935 for the bicentennial of the pioneer's birth, an event which produced much material which is now collected. A commemorative stamp issued by the Postal Service in 1942 to mark the 150th anniversary of Kentucky statehood shows Boone, with his party, entering the state. A 1968 stamp in the American Folklore series pictures a long rifle, powder horn, tomahawk, knife and a board on which his name is carved. A 1974 commemorative stamp marks the 200th anniversary of Fort Harrod, Ky.

In 1969 Kentucky observed the bicentennial of his 1769 entry into the state, proclaiming it the Boone Bicentennial. The promotion resulted in even more collectible material.

Swiss Days at Berne, Ind., To Include Quilt Show

Berne, a northern Indiana city known for its Swiss heritage will stage its fourth Swiss Days July 27 and 28. A variety of family-type entertainment and activity is planned including tours of some Berne industries.

A quilt show has become established as a highlight of Swiss Days, with entries accepted for judging on July 25, from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Public viewing will be from 6 to 9 p.m. Thursday, 8 a.m. to 9 p.m. Friday and 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday in the Commons of South Adams High School. More than 150 quality quilts were shown last year. The school is one mile south of Berne, and there is a $1 admission to see the displays.

Quilts in the competition must be hand quilted, and the committee reserves the right to reject any entry. Categories are pieced, embroidered, applique, juvenile, 50 years and older, and one-piece cloth.

Information requests may be sent to Mrs. Sarah F. Steffen, 707 N. Main St., Bluffton IN 46714.

Boone's Granddaughter Still Teaching at 96

1-?-68-T. Trib.

CHARLESTON, Mo. (AP) — Pride in her ancestry, her adopted home in Charleston and 81 years' service as a music teacher highlight the life of Miss Kate Boone, still a voice and piano instructor at 96.

Miss Boone is a descendant of the Kentucky frontierman, Daniel Boone.

One of her voice pupils was Betty Cooper, who became the wife of Missouri Gov. Warren E. Hearnes. 4

"She has a beautiful voice," Miss Boone said.

The nearly blind woman gives lessons in her quarters at a nursing home. She began losing her sight 25 years ago.

Miss Boone uses a strong light on her piano to teach. She minimizes the glare by wearing an eyeshade.

One of her voice pupils is Kathy Delaney, 16, a high school sophomore who is the sixth generation of her family Miss Boone has taught.

Miss Boone, who thinks she may be the nation's oldest music teacher, doesn't believe rock 'n' roll is music, but she insists "all music has its place."

"Every child should begin withclassical music, because it is the basis of all music," she said.

She acknowledges jazz has merit.

"Guy Lombardo and a few other top band leaders produce beautiful music," she said.

Miss Boone lived 22 years in her native Clinton, Ky. Her great-great grandfather, Bryant Boone, was a brother of Daniel Boone.

The family moved to Charleston in 1893. She is the youngest and last surviving child of Judge and Mrs. William Fenton Boone's 10 sons and 3 daughters.

By Joan Praed Lyons

The Daniel Boone of 1983 uses his muzzleloader to shoot at targets instead of at Indians; his log home has indoor plumbing; he feeds wild animals in the winter and is reforesting his land; his wife is a grain merchant who drives a Corvette.

These changes are not really surprising. After all, it's been 162 years since the pioneer Daniel Boone died at the age of 86.

What is remarkable is that his descendant, Daniel Boone of Boone County, Indiana, has acquired some of the pioneer skills of his great-great-great-great-grandfather and adapted them to today's world.

Dan became interested in his famous ancestor only after his love for guns led him to study their history. The muzzleloaders that bore the names of the Pennsylvania counties where they were made helped him picture the Daniel Boone who used them so long ago.

Although Dan's parents, Ralph and Marietta Dodd Boone, received a card from the National Genealogical Society at Washington, D.C., when Dan was born, they did not fill in the requested information and return it.

But, sparked by Dan's interest, in the early 1960s Marietta Boone began researching Boone family history. A member of the Daughters of the American Revolution through her lineage in the Simon Shoemaker family, her search led her to museums in Louisville and Frankfort, Ky., to Berks County, Pa., where Daniel Boone was born, to North Carolina, where he reared a family, and to St. Charles County, Missouri, where he died.

Although the pioneer Daniel never lived in Indiana, he explored in this area and is known to have been as close as Eagle Creek Park, where a beech tree still stands bearing the carved inscription, "D.B. was here." Historians have noted that it was Daniel's practice to leave a message carved on a beech tree indicating his presence as he moved into new territory.

Since Dan's name always has drawn comments from those who knew a Boone ancestor somewhere, he made notes of these leads and passed them on to his mother, who followed them up with letters.

She concluded that her husband and sons are sixth and seventh generation descendants of Daniel through his son, Joseph.

In the meantime, Dan joined the National Muzzleloading Rifle Association and began regularly attending shoots to perfect his marksmanship.

"Each guy you talk to will tell you something to help," Dan says.

Resting on pegs above the fireplace in his home is the first gun he made, a Bedford County (Pa.) rifle. He now uses the 20th he has made. Some of the others he has given to family and friends.

Patterned after a 1780-90 rifle, Boone's muzzleloader has a curly maple stock inlaid with handcarved silver and brass. The steel muzzle has a .62 caliber bore. Boone makes his own lead balls and uses pillow ticking patches and gunpowder from Scotland.

Dan's marksmanship has won him a roomful of plaques and trophies, the most recent of which was for first place for offhand shooting at 100 yards in the 1982 National Muzzleloading Match at Friendship, Ind.

Some of the muzzleloader matches are primitive and participants wear handmade buckskin garments and live in a lean-to or teepee. They cook in a cast iron pot or on a spit over the fire, either inside or outside the shelter, depending on the weather.

For such occasions Dan wears garments handmade by a craftsman at Friendship. But his older son, Jeffrey Daniel, made his own deerskin garments and equipment, including an antler bone knife, a deerskin bullet bag, a powder horn made from a cow's horn, and a pan brush made from the tip of a deer antler tufted with plant fibers gathered in the woods.

Daniel Boone of Boone County draws a bead on the past.

The other two members of the Boone family are not as avid fans of muzzleloading competitions as are Dan and Jeff.

Janet Boone is a grain merchant at the Boone County Farm Bureau Co-op at Lebanon. When the boys were small, she dressed in pioneer garb and took them along to many of Dan's shoots, but she has had little time for that since she began working.

The younger Boone son, John, is a sophomore at Lebanon High School and his present interest lies with his mother's Corvette.

Dan works full time at the postoffice in Lebanon, overseeing supplies, sales and service for walk-in customers. He also farms with his father.

"You might say it's a hobby," he says, "because it's not profitable any more."

Another hobby is collecting and restoring old John Deere tractors.

The original Daniel Boone was portrayed in a painting.

In 1974, with the help of friends and relatives, Boone built the 3,200-square-foot log home in which the family lives in southwestern Boone County. The timber came from North Carolina, where the pioneer Daniel built a log cabin more than 200 years ago.

Janet has decorated their home with primitive antiques, Indian artifacts and tea leaf ironstone, providing an appropriate background for Dan's guns and his hunting trophies, a caribou downed with a flintlock rifle in Labrador and a mule deer from Colorado.

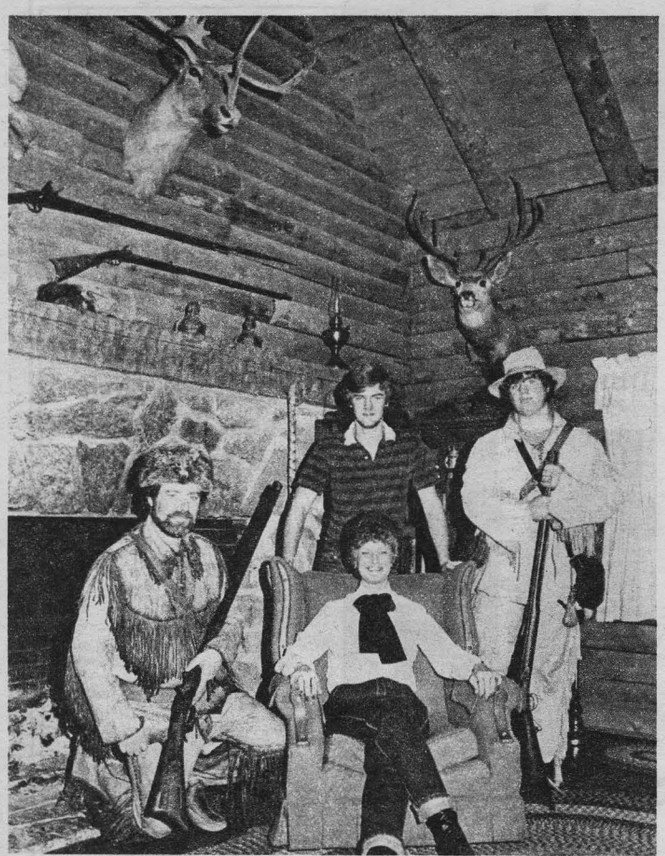
The log home nestles in the woodland on the family acreage and Dan has added seedlings of more than 50 varieties of native trees to augment the existing timber and to attract a variety of wildlife. When he fills the grain bin, he collects the cracked grain that sifts out and saves it to put out in pans for rabbits and in birdfeeders. During the severe winter of 1978, he counted as many as eight rabbits at a time dining on corn and sharing it with an occasional deer. Woodcocks and quail also come to feed.

Dan piles brush throughout the woods to give the rabbits shelter from coyotes and foxes.

His famous ancestor was a trapper as well as a hunter. Is Dan a trapper, too?

"As a matter of fact, I just started collecting pelts for a coat for my wife," he says, as he reaches for a small drying frame hanging from a rafter.

On the frame is stretched the pelt of a field mouse. ☆



Boone, his wife and two sons, enjoy life in their large log-cabin home.

GENEALOGY

BY WILLARD HEISS

Reams of paper and gallons of ink have been consumed to count and recount the lives of the Boones. Even in recognition of "Boone Day" in Kentucky I hesitate to offer comment as there are others who are far more knowledgeable and interested than I.

From Quaker records I have compiled data that may add a branch to some part of the famiy tree. I suppose it is common knowledge that "the" Boone family had tenuous Quaker connections. This connection ceased with Squire Boone. In 1748 he was disowned by Exeter Meeting in Berks County, Pennsylvania.

The Boones lived in or near Quaker settlements until they removed into Kentucky. It is alleged two Haworth families (Quaker) accompanied Boone on his first trip to the west.

Nevertheless, there were no Boones in the Quaker records of North Carolina until 1814. At that time John Boon (usually without the terminal "e") and his wife, Dorcas, and children joined with Friends of Springfield Meeting.

This Boon family lived in Guilford County, North Carolina. A cursory check of the Guilford County records fails to cast light on his ancestry. I would expect that if time were spent in the court records and deeds a link might be found.

If John Boon is related to the Boones of Berks County, Pennsylvania the Quaker connection was long since obscured. I suspect that he came into the Society of Friends through his wife. I have been unsuccessful in identifying her. I tried to use the name, Dorcas, as a tool. It is a surprisingly uncommon name at that period.

In the 1820's John & Dorcas and their family (which included married sons) removed to Indiana and settled in southern Randolph County. They moved in 1825 to Milford Meeting in southwestern Wayne County. In the 1830's many of the family were living near Spiceland in Henry County, Ind. and were members of Spiceland Meeting.

Henry County civil records would probably give some information about John Boon. Presumably he preceded his wife in death. Dorcas Boon was born 4-12-1765 in N.C. and died 1-21-1848 buried in Spiceland burying ground.

Their children were: Driver Boon born 1795 died 1881, Spiceland. He married first, 1819, to Anna Kersey and married second, 1844, to Elizabeth (Cooper) Gause. John Boon born 1798, married 1816 to Sarah Pierson. After 1840 they lived in Hamilton County, Indiana.

The last four children of John and Dorcas Boon may not have married. Charles was born 1801; Elizabeth born 1803 died 1870; Stephen born 1806 died 1840 and Dorcas Boon born 1818 died 1875. All were buried at Spiceland.

In The Quakers of Spiceland Richard Ratcliff writes, "Driver Boone, one of the earliest postmasters at Spiceland, used to sort out the mail of persons likely to be at Monthly meeting, carry this mail in the top of his tall Quaker hat, and after services go around and distribute the mail."

Boone Descendant Views Grissom Memorial Center

T. H. Star 11-7-71

11-7-71

MITCHELL, Ind.—An 86-year-old Harrison County man who is a descendant of Daniel Boone voiced wonderment recently when he toured the Grissom Memorial Center at Spring Mill State Park and viewed for the first time the interior of a spacecraft.

Ray Boone, resident of Laconia, near Corydon, climbed the three steps to the viewing stand and stood peering into the cabin of the Mercury spacecraft. He was silent for several seconds, then he said, "My, how would anybody be able to keep in mind what all those switches were for. I'd say those fellows really have to know what they are doing."

It was a special occasion for the old gentleman, who lives on land settled by Squire Boone in 1807. He and a fellow graduate of the class of 1901 from Laconia Grade School, Lenore LaHue, were on an outing with his cousin, Mrs. R. Milton May, also of Laconia.

Boone found the space exhibit in the Grissom Memorial Center almost as exciting as the home run hit by his cousin, Milt May, to win one of the World Series games for the Pittsburgh Pirates. He hasnt' come down to earth yet, according to Mrs. May.

With a twinkle in his eye that indicated he still enjoys life despote his years, he marveeled that in his lifetime he had seen the advent of the automobile, the airplane, space travel and moon walks by astronauts, not to mention being able to watch the World Series on live television.

Asked what he thought of the space program, the former highway builder, scrap metal-lumber dealer, real estate man, and theater owner, said, "There is no reason why they shouldn't or couldn' go and walk up there if the covering of the moon will permit it. It was a risk, but I think the possibilities were worth the risk. There are possibilities there that could open up relief for the earth."

The two former classmates, the only survivors from a class of six, together again in their autumn years, walked through the swinging door of the memorial and into the brilliant sunlight, that, like friendship, makes the days of autumn more beautiful.

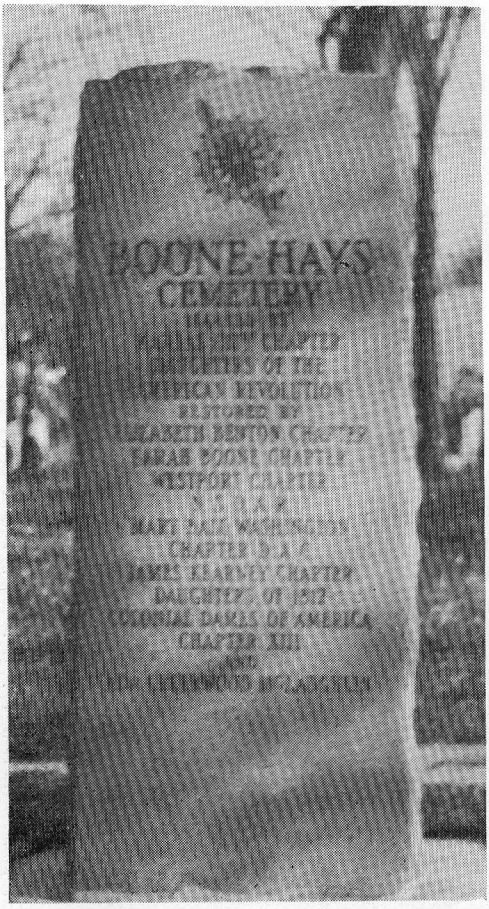
GRAVE OF DANIEL MORGAN BOONE



Mary Ball Washington Chapter, D.A.C., Kansas City, Mo., took part in marking grave of Daniel Morgan Boone.

MARY BALL WASHINGTON CHAPTER, Kansas City, Missouri, opened its 1960-61 season with a Re-Assembly Tea, October 25, 1960, in the East Room of the Woman's City Club. Mrs. Ben Page, Regent, presided.

At the speaker's table was a beautiful floral arrangement, flanked by Colonial blue candles to carry out the color scheme of D.A.C. blue and gold.

We were pleased to have as our guest of honor, Missouri's State Regent, Mrs. Shelton Lessley.

The speaker was Dr. A. T. Brown, Professor of History at Kansas City University, who gave a fine address on the subject: "The Colonies Before the Revolution." And Dr. Brown graciously consented to allow his notes to be sent to our Missouri headquarters in Washington, where they are now on file.

Between forty-five and fifty attended the Tea.

So much has been written about the famous Daniel Boone, who discovered Kentucky, and who, with his wife Rebecca Bryan Boone and their family, and other brave souls, followed the Wilderness Road, through the Cumberland Gap, to settle in Kentucky, but so little is known about their son, Daniel Morgan Boone.

Daniel and Rebecca's first son, James, when a boy of sixteen, was killed by Indians; Israel, the second son, was killed when he and his father were attacked by Indians, and thus Daniel Morgan, the third son, became the eldest surviving.

It was in 1787 that he left the home in Kentucky, crossed Indiana and Illinois, and it was June when he arrived at the little village of St. Louis, Missouri.

Daniel Morgan Boone was destined to play a very important part in the early history of Missouri. He was a trapper, and set his traps as far west as The Blue, near Independence, Missouri, and it is said he was the first white man to enter what is now Jackson County. In 1809 he was appointed by Governor Meriwether Lewis as one of a committee of three to build block houses. He and his brother Nathan were commissioned officers in the War of 1812. In 1814, with this same brother Nathan, he laid out and surveyed the first cross state road, from St. Charles to Old Franklin. In 1820 he took a prominent part in the new Gasconade County. He took his brother Jesse's place as a member of the commission appointed to select a site for the new State capital, and the selection was approved December 31, 1821. In 1825 or 1826, he was appointed Agriculturist for the Kansas (or Kaw) Indian Agency. He was appointed Commissioner, together with Major Berrycroft and Stephen Cooper in 1837, to fix the Missouri-Iowa boundary that had been long in dispute. These are just a few of the many things in which he took an important part in the early history of Missouri.

Daniel Morgan Boone died in 1839. His wife died in 1850. And their remains have lain in unmarked graves for many years in the old Boone-Hays Cemetery at the northwest corner of 63rd and Brooklyn, in Kansis City, Missouri. If there ever has been a marker for either of these graves such marker has long since disappeared.

Dr. Johnston Lykins of Kansas City, many years ago, made an eloquent appeal for recognition of this man's grave, and he said:

"Kentucky has reclaimed her own great pioneer, his father, but the remains of our great pioneer, no less worthy of a monument, rest in our midst in an unmarked grave."

From 1932 to 1935, Mrs. Ada Greenwood McLaughlin, danghter of Prof. Greenwood, Superintendent of Kansas City Schools, and herself a teacher of history in Westport High School made a valiant effort to arouse interest in this project, but those were depression years.

At last, action has been taken which has brought results. On September 25, 1960 at 3:00 p. m., in this little Boone-Hays Cemetery, now restored, a monument was unveiled by Master Bryant Shakleford Callaway, a great-great-great-great grandson of Susanna Boone Callaway, who was Daniel Morgan Boone's sister.

This monument bears the D.A.R. insignia, followed by—

The grave of Sarah Griffin (Lewis) Boone was marked by Sarah Boone Chapter D.A.R.

After the unveiling of the monument those attending were invited to the Paseo Methodist Church, where fitting dedicatory services were held. Mrs. Ben Page, immediate Past Regent of Kansas City Chapter D.A.R., now Regent of Mary Ball Washington Chapter of American Colonists, presided, assisted by Mrs. J. Carl Jourdon, Regent of Sarah Boone Chapter D.A.R., and among those present were the sons of the late Mrs. Ada Greenwood McLaughlin, Mr. Thomas G., and Mr. Henry McLaughlin.

CAPTAIN JOHN HALL CHAPTER, Mexico, Missouri was organized March 12, 1923 by Mrs. Robert M. White, a Charter member of the State Organization and its first State Regent. The Chapter was named for her ancestor, Captain John Hall, who was prominent in his service to the Colonies.

The Chapter holds eight reglar meetings. A special annual luncheon is held each year in recognition of the Founding of Jamestown. We have two new members and one re-instated member. The Chapter mourns the death of Mrs. Paul Ekern who with great interest and devotion served the State and Chapter in many offices.

We support the National Projects—Microfilming, National Defense and National Headquarters Fund; State Projects—Memorial Forest Planting which honors our State Regent, and chapter members contribute money to the School of the Ozarks. This year we sent seventy-five Christmas gifts to the school besides two large boxes of clothing. It has been the custom for members to bring gifts for Veterans to the Christmas Meeting to be sent to the Veterans Hospital in St. Louis.

Each year the Chapter offers three prizes of $10.00 for essay contests written by Junior High School students on a subject selected about Colonial History.

The Captain John Hall Chapter will entertain the thirty eighth State Assembly of the Missouri Society which will convene in Mexico, Missouri on March 21, 22, 1961 and which will honor Charter members.

Dear Mr. Wesley:

We believe that we have names of two relatives of Walter Boone, 1889-1963. There was a Walter L. Boone who lived in Terre Haute before 1929 with his wife Mattie at 1421 N. 26th. Listed as living at the same address were Hogdty (student) and Hozie. Hogdty Boone died in 1958. (He had lived more recently at 614 Gilbert Ave.)A local mortician was able to give the following addresses of relatives of the family:

Rev. Ben Boone

We do not have the microfilm for the Sullivan County, Indiana, Census for 1840; but I am enclosing 2 copies of the listing for Susan Boone and children from the 1850, Sullivan County, Census.

George Boon is mentioned as early settler, justice of peace, purchaser of land, representative 1825-30, senator, 1834, sheriff 1821-25; and with a physical description of being over 6 feet tall, phenominally awkward and with big feet in the History of Green and Sullivan Counties, on various pages. However, there is nothing about his family.

The Biographical Directory of Indiana General Assembly gives a brief sketch of George, stating he had ten children but didn't name them. According to this he died Jan. 10, 1841. The Sullivan County Courthouse burned in 1850 but wills from 1841 may still exist. The information for this directory was gathered from the Wm. H. English Collection, Indiana Historical Society, which has statements about 19th century legislators.

In checking the Sullivan County Cemetery Records we found many Boone/Boon families but the first names are not the same as those you are seeking.

The Indiana Magazine of History, V 17 p97 and V 23 p385, has a letter from Tunis Quick to his wife, Susannah, dated Jan. 10, 1842, stating, "George Boon departed this life last night, age 57 years."

You might write the Sullivan County Historical Society, P.O. Box 326, Sullivan IN 47882; and /or the Indiana Historical Society Library, Indiana State Library, 140 N. Senate Ave., Indianapolis IN 46204.

Dear Sir:

I have been in contact with Mrs. Shirley Worrel of Terre Haute in order to try and find some proofs concerning my Boone Ancestors.

I am seeking this information in order to prove lineage for DAR Through Shirley Worrell I have learned that you have Sullivan County materials and copy facilities.

I need any information that will link Mary Jane Boone, my great grandmother to her parents. Benjamin Boone and Susan Sweeny Boone, and Benjamin Boone to his parents George Boone and Elizabeth McCammon Boone. George was born in KY in 1783 and died while serving in the state legislature in Indianapolis in 1841. Shirley indicated that she had found a listing for Benjamin Boone in the Sullivan Co. Census of 1840 on page 119. She also found a listing for Susan Boone and children in the 14 Aug. 1850 Census, Hadden Township, Sullivan Co listed as part of the family of Valentine Sweeny. I would like copies of those records - (2 copies each.

don't have 1840 for Sullivan

Dear Sir or Madam:

Do you have any books or pamphlets on old settlers or pioneers that went west during the 1800's. I am interested in the following names:

Beedle (Abraham, Erastus, Franklin, John, Johnson, Joseph)
Boone or Boone (Thomas & Wife Mary (Ogden) Woods Boon or Boone and their children: Daniel, Solomon, John Ogden, Willis and Bathsheba)

Bathsheba died at Prairieton, Indiana before 1836 but don't know what cemetery she is buried -if there are more than one. Do you have any information on this particular person?

Beaver (Ulyses nickname US, Selby, and Samuel)
Pierson (Willis a son or grandson of a French soldier who fought for America during the Revolutionary War and did not return to France)
McCabe (James, Catherine, Robert Sawyer; and James' and his wife Eleanor's (Woody) McCabe daughter Nancy (McCabe)Miller wife of John Miller a merchant of Terre Haute, Indiana.

Emert (Calvin)
King (William)
Woods (Thomas, William)

Because so many of the family settled near Terre Haute, Indiana , such as Clark County, Illinois, I thought they might have resided in Vigo County before going on west.

Sincerely,

Violet F Wade

Mr. Edward N. Howard
Director of the Vigo County Library
222 N. Seventh St.
Terre Haute, Indiana

Dear Mr. Howard:

On Jan. 26, 1975 I read with great interest the article concerning your wife's gift to you of grave-stone rubbings of your great-great grandparents, in that days copy of the The Tribune-Star, Terre Haute, Ind.

Your great-great grandmother Sarah Bryant Howard was a sister of my great-great-great-great grandmother Martha Bryan Boone, wife of Edward (Neddy) Boone younger brother of the famous Daniel. She, too, was a sister of Daniel's wife Rebecca Bryan Boone.

Does the city library in Terre Haute, have, or do you personally own, a copy of the Historical Book and Souvenir Progam of Carlisle Indiana's Sesquicentennial, 1965? I note in it that Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Howard were charter members of the first Missionary Baptist Church in southern Sullivan Co. and that the original two-acre plot was given by Cornelius Howard.

Do you have the lineage of the Bryans? In the July, 1967 quarterly issue of the Boone Pioneer Echoes, fifteen generations of the Bryan family of Rebecca Bryan Boone are given with a bibliography of reference works. That volume of Boone Pioneer Echoes also contains the Fitzgerald Family (Earls of Desmond) going back from the family of your great great grandmother Howard eighteen generations to Walter Fitz Other, living 1100 – a Domesday Tenant of lands in Berks, Bucks, Middlesex, Harts & Surrey, and keeper of the Great Forest.

Some time when Mr. Hand and I are in the library in T. Haute, I would appreciate talking briefly with you. Some of my ancestors were early settlers near Carlisle, and I believe that some whom I'm having difficulty in tracing may have lived for a time in the Indian Prairie community in its very early days.

If you do not have the Boone Pioneer Echoes issue I mentioned, and would like to see it, I could bring it to Terre Haute some time when visiting the library. Both my husband and I are former Terre Haute residents. You may be acquainted with two of my Garfield High School classmates Laverne Anstead Hughes and Laurence Sawyer, editor of The Terre Haute Star.

The Echoes was in error in reporting or listing Mary Bryan and Aylee Bryan as the sisters of Rebecca Bryan who married men named "Howard", unless either one also had the name Sarah.

Sincerely,
your distant cousin,
Martha Church Hand
(Mrs. Arthur W. Hand)

THE BOONE FAMILY ASSOCIATION OF WASHINGTON

Welcomes as a member anyone who is a descendant of the Boone family, regardless of place of residence, and announces its revised membership schedule, offering a wider choice of opportunity for usefulness, as well as increased income to the B.F.A. to meet the cost of the new postal rates and other mounting expenses. The membership year is from August 1st to July 31st. Annual dues are as follows:

MEMBER: a lineal descendant of a Boone ancestor	$ 1.00
ASSOCIATE: wife, husband, widow or widower of a lineal descendant	1.00
JUNIOR: descendant (under 18 years) of a member	.50
SUSTAINING member:	5.00
RESEARCH member: dues devoted to research and the Research Center	10.00
CONTRIBUTOR: dues for the work of the B.F.A.	20.00
PATRON: has privilege of designating use of dues	30.00
FAMILY GROUP: Boone Family groups wishing to participate	50.00

That all descendants may have a part in developing in the Seattle Public Library the only Boone Research Center in the country, all Boone Family groups are invited to join. A membership card will be issued to the individual designated by the Group, which may also nominate a representative for the B.F.A. Board of Directors.

A subscription to the Boone SCOUT, a lively little quarterly publication dedicated to the genealogy, news and queries of the Boones and allied familes is included with each membership. Non-descendants, libraries and organizations may receive the SCOUT for $1.00 per year (Aug. 1-July 31). Queries are free to members and subscribers. There is no charge for service and no salaries. A lineage record of Boone descent, even if incomplete, is a requirement for membership acceptance. Blanks for this purpose are supplied free. Write to:

MRS. J.H.BUCHANAN, HISTORIAN, 905 Boylston Avenue, Apt. P, Seattle 4, Washington.

SOME AIDS IN VERIFYING YOUR LINEAGE RECORD.

Since family tradition so often has proved unreliable, it cannot be accepted as the basis for an authentic lineage record. Thus statements of relationship beyond personal knowledge should be verified. The following are approved sources:

1. Court or historical records, deeds, wills, census, and Orphans Court. Be sure to give file number, volume, section and page for reference.

2. Private records as: births, deaths, and marriages from the family Bible; obituaries. Get certified copy if possible, or photostat.

3. Affidavits from elderly persons regarding relationships of those actually known to them.

4. Other sources: undertaker's and sexton's records; tombstones; naturalization papers; military records; baptismal, marriage and other church records; county histories; newspapers; biographical and genealogical publications; D.A.R. and S.A.R. records and magazines, and "mortality schedules" distributed by the Director of the Census to the state concerned by presentation to the state library, a recognized historical society, or to the D.A.R. in Washington, D. C. Inquiry will reveal the location of this valuable material in your state, doubly important as it antedates the establishment of vital statics in most states, though covering only the twelve months preceding the census records of 1850, 1860, 1870 and 1880. Always indicate where and from whom your data were obtained.

Your participation in this nation-wide invitation is earnestly solicited.

MEMORIAL

This copy of the Boone Scout will be dedicated as a memorial tribute to Mrs. Bethesda Beals Buchanan the former Historiam of the Association and Editor of the Boone Scout. Mrs. Buchanan passed away 28 July 1973 after a short illness. Her many friends and Boone 'Cousins' will be saddened to hear of her sudden passing. Her friendly letters and cheery greetings will be missed by all who knew her.

Mrs. Bethesda B. Buchanan was a person of many talents.

She was the youngest of five children of Nathan Hiatt Beals and Sarah Jane (Johnson) Beals. Her early years were spent on a large farm in Waverly, Iowa. At the age of eleven her parents sold their farm and came to Washington State, settling in Burlington, Washington. Here, her parents also had a farm. Her father was a member of the Washington State Legislature. She attended local schools and the University of Washington, and upon graduating went to Yale University and took graduate work in English and teaching. It was quite unusual for women to go to Yale at this time. Upon returning to Washington State, she taught at Ellensberg Normal School for several years. In 1907, along with seven others, she started what is now known as the Anti-Tuberculosis League of King County, and worked on the first Tuberculosis Christmas Seal Program which had its start in Seattle. Later after this Program had spread accross our Country, she was sent by the Anti-Tuberculosis Association to many countries in Europe to set up this program to raise funds to help combat tuberculosis. She retired after thirty-five years with the Association.

As she always was interested in family, it is not surprising that she decided to find out more about some of her ancesters. She decided upon the Boone Branch of her family, as the Beals Family had been quite well researched by members of her own family. She contacted Mrs. Hazel Spraker, Mr. William Boone Douglas and others who were working on Boone Family History. She soon found that there were several other persons who claimed a relationship to the Boone Family. They got together and in 1953 she started our Washington State Boone Family Association. Since she was about the only one who was doing genealogy, she became the Historian of the group. As she had accumulated a large amount of Boone Family records and books, she helped set up the Boone Family Research Center at the Seattle Public Library. To-day we can be very proud of her efforts as there are many books, pamphalets, and family lineages on the Boones and related families which are readily available to all who use the Boone Research Center at the Library.

About ten years ago Mrs Buchanan founded a scholarship at the University of Puget Sound, Tacoma, Washington, to help deserving students in their studies to work with handicapped persons in institutions. Some of these graduate students from this grant are now working in hospitals, clinics and convalescent homes in the area.
As Historian, in 1956 she put out the first BOONE SCOUT. It has grown to a six page bulletin with a sizeable subscription. She interested the Association in many projects, i.e.. sending a representative from New York area to the annual ceremonies at the Hall of Fame of Famous Americans, the project to save Daniel's and Rebecca's graves from being moved to the Capital Grounds in Kentucky, ——Daniel Boone Day Seattle World Fair, Seattle, Washington- — the ceremonies for dedication of the Daniel Boone Submarine at Seattleand the ceremonies for the resteration of Indian Creek Church in Butler County, Ohio— —to name but a few of the projects she interested the Association.

Although, in poor health for the last few years, she still found time to take part in the various activities of our Association. It will be probably a long time before another member in the group will be as completely dedicated to a definite interest and program. Her many efforts will be greatly missed by the Boone Family and all who knew her——she really was a most unusual person of many talents.

Recollections of GEORGE LUTHER BOONE... Due to problems connected with the move of the Boone Records from Historian's home to that of your present Historian, the source materials for this article have been misplaced, and no end of searching seemed to turn them up again. So, the next installment of this story will be continued in an early copy of the SCOUT. ED.

THE BOONE SCOUT: Due to increasing costs of printing and paper, and the threatened raise in Postal Rates for January 1974, it is a matter of life and death for the SCOUT that dues be paid promptly and that subscription dues for Boone Scout Only be kept up to date. These dues and subscriptions become due every year on 1 August. Please check your records to be sure your dues or subscriptions are up-to-date. The Executive Board voted at their last meeting to increase BOONE SCOUT (Only) Subscriptions from $1.00 to $1.50 beginning 1 January 1974. Of course, this will not have any effect on subscriptions which are already paid up.

ISRAEL BOONE: The book "DESCENDANTS OF ISRAEL BOONE, published in 1969, is now in its Second Edition. This large book 8½ x 11 x 2" thick, contains data on more than 4900 descendants of this hitherto little-known brother of the famous Daniel.
There are 694 numbered pages plus many other pages containing copies of old photographs, documents etc. The index contains more than 10,00 names, its special feature being birth and death dates for all descendants (if available), making it easy to distinguish between the many "Johns","Williams" etc., a problem with most books of this kind. Price $25.00 Postpaid.
Please make all checks payable to: Alice H. Boone

At the time of this bulletin going to press, the restoration which we have heard so much about, and have waited so long for, has actually started. A $340,000 grant from the U.S. Bureau of Outdoor Recreation to the Kentucky Department of Parksfor the expansion of the Boonesborough camping site, which is adjacent to Fort Boonesborough State Park, got th s project started. It is hoped to be completed by next year, in time, for the 200th anniversary of the State of Kentucky. Since the site was settled by Daniel Boone, and his followers in 1775, it is fitting that the Fort be part of these celebrations. It is also fitting that axes similar to those used in those days were also used in the first ground clearing ceremonies. Many thanks to the Bureau of Outdoor Recreation and to Kentucky's Governer Wendall Ford for getting this worth while project under way.

THE SQUIRE BOONE CAVERNS RESTORATION PROJECT. This restoration project in Harrison County Indiana was completed in May of this year. These caverns were discovered by Squire Boone in 1790, and because of their curious geologic formation have been of great interest ever since. Until recently, the area of the caverns was not to readily accessable to the public. Now with the creation of metal stairs, natural bridges, walkways and special lighting, the caves have become available for all to enjoy. The Caverns are described as perhaps "one of the most spectacular caves in America", featuring three very unique waterfalls, the world's largest rinestone formation, and a hugetowering "Rock of Ages Column housed in a gigantic domed room usually referred to as the "Rotunda Cathedral". Guides take the tourists through the caverns on a fifty-five minutes tour, using electronic megaphones to be heard over the tremendous noise of the waterfalls. At the end of the excursion a stereophonic presentation "The Saga of Squire Boone completes the tour in the Rotunda Cathedral.

Squire Boone moved his family near these caverns in 1804 and started a grist mill at the opening of the Caverns.. The water roaring out of the mouth of the cavern was used to turn the mill wheel. When Squire Boone died in 1815 his four sons Isaiah, Moses Johnathan and Enoch fulfilled his last wish and buried him in the cavern. At the recreation center near the cavern there is a very interesting log house containing the Charles Horrar Buck Creek Forge and another log house called the Hannah Boone Gift Shop. Both bring back memories of the early pioneer Boones who once lived here.

At the dedication ceremonies on 26 May 1973, it was fitting to have Ray Boone, the oldest known relative of Squire Boone, the brother of Daniel Boone. He was eighty-eight four days after the opening of the Caverns. The Caverns are located ten miles south of Corydon, Indiana, off S.R. 135 Highway.

From material sent in by Mrs William Satori, Louisville, Kentucky.

An interesting clipping was sent in to your editor telling of the many old historic Boone equipment, clothing which had belonged to Daniel Boone which have been collected and are now in the Dorris Museum at Eastern, Kentucky. It mentioned that much research had been done to determine that these objects were actually authentic. It mentioned that if all of the Kentucky rifles which had been examined, which reportedly belonged to Daniel Boone had been kept for the museum, there would have been enough rifles for a small army. Perhaps these stories were added to the articles to make them appear more valuable. An interesting piece of wood cut from an old dead beech tree. On was carved DANIEL BOONE JUNE 1777 No one had noticed this inscription before as it was about twenty feet above the ground. It was possible that it may have been actually carved by Daniel Boone, as he was in the area in 1777. On April of that year Indians attacked Fort Boonsborough when Daniel Boone was outside the stockade. During the two day battle Boone's ankle was broken. The Indians kept returning every few days until August when they went to the Ohio River.

Could a man who had a broken ankle for a month of so climb up twenty feet to carve his name in a tree? It seems quite possible if he were being chased by Indians.

(After the covered wagon trains began to bring land-hungry settlers to the Oregon Territory, one might expect to find some representatives of the Boone Family among them. Nor would he be disappointed. Following is the first installment of a statement by George Luther Boone, an early settler of the area in a choice location near the Pacific Ocean. Descendants still live in the same spot. -Ed-)

Little is known of the life of Rachael Boone other than the facts related already about her father, her husband, and her children. She is reported to have died about 1835, (probably Kentucky).

Rachael's sixth child, Cynthia Merrifield, was born 25 Nov. 1799 in Jefferson County, Kentucky. Alexander had served in the militia of Shelby County, Kentucky, about this time. Nothing is known of her until her marriage which is recorded in Hardin County, Kentucky, on April 12, 1818, and her name is spelled "Cinthia" as in the Smith Family Tree.

A NOTE from Mrs. Milton May of Laconia, Indiana, who is spearheading the movement to establish a replica of "Hannah Boone's Cabin" as a Center for Boone Information, Arts, Crafts, states that the project has now been incorporated as a "nonprofit organization" as of December 1, 1972. Located quite near "Squire Boone's Caverns," due to open this year in late summer or early autumn, the eager tourist will be able to buy many interesting souvenirs of the area. An especially attractive pen sketch of "Old Goshen" showing preparations for the service is available in mailer envelopes for 35¢. She is still asking for any size picture of Hannah for the fireplace.

FROM one of our long-time members, Mrs. O. C. Binder (Mildred Tatlock) of Waterloo, Nebraska, comes an announcement of publication of a book of poems, the name "Life Story" taken from the more important poem in the book. Mrs. Binder is no novice as a writer. She is known as a columnist, some having a political slant, as a genealogist, and has contributed articles and poetry to papers in the Midwest, to one, the Omaha World Herald, for 23 years! The price of Life Story is $3 plus 45¢ for postage and handling. Order from Exposition Press, Inc., 50 Jericho Turnpike, Jericho, New York 11753. I am to be favored with a complimentary copy! I am very pleased to be so honored and thank Mrs. Binder for her lovely gift.

A SNAPSHOT in color of a happy bride and groom has been received from Mrs. George O. Bean (Dora Ann Boone) of Mokena, Illinois. The bride, a dainty little person with "corn silk" golden hair - daughter of George O. Bean - seems extra small beside her robust bridegroom, Ronald Lee Bisping of New Lenox, Illinois. Though the wedding occurred several months ago, we hope it is not too late to wish the young couple a long and happy life together. We thank Mrs. Bean for telling us and for the lovely snapshot.

MAY I remind you of the especial importance of paying your dues (past and present) as soon as possible, lest your officers be hampered in providing the type of celebration worthy of a twenty years' effort. Several couples or more from our neighbors in Oregon, California, Arizona, Colorado, Texas, and Illinois have "declared their intentions," while others, some farther eastward, are hopeful of attending. Two more SCOUTS are to be issued (April and July) and inflation is still a factor in printing, but not in our scenery nor the welcome which awaits you. The one must be seen to be believed and the other experienced to be understood.

PLEASE return the lineage blanks we sent some time ago so we can process them before the meeting. Be sure to include your dues to save time and stamps. We thank those who have not yet received their Certificates of Membership for their patience. With one helper on vacation and another in the hospital, the SCOUT to be printed and sent out (hopefully) before April 1, it is more than a little busy here! But we expect to get all certificates out before the July meeting.

(The final installment of the brochure submitted by Gordon Wood of Weslaco, Texas follows. We thank Mr. Wood for his contribution and trust you may find it not only of interest but helpful in your search for clues. -Ed-)

"Samuel owned a gunlock factory at Frederick, Maryland, on the Potomac river when the Revolutionary War broke out. He supplied gunlocks for the Maryland Council of Safety until Nov. 10, 1778, when the entire factory was sold. We do not know why, but Samuel had great difficulty getting paid for his work. He paid out gold for labor and materials but received continental script from the Maryland Council of Safety, which became worthless. In any case, this man gave of himself to secure freedom for us, his descendants, and for that we honor his name. On Jan. 11, 1781, we find him enlisted in a troop of light dragoons in Frederick County.

"About 1883, Squire Boone, Jr., Samuel's former apprentice and brother of Daniel Boone, visited Maryland and induced Samuel to return to Kentucky with him. It is not known for sure if Samuel took his entire family with him at this time or if they followed later, but they eventually resettled Squire Boone, Jr.'s station in Shelby County, Kentucky, on Brashear Creek.

"The tax rolls for Fayette County, Virginia, reveal 500 acres of land entered for Samuel Boone, Sr., on 12-27-1782; a Samuel Boone, 340 acres, 5-12-1783, on the big fork of the Elkhorn River; 500 acres, 3-15-1783; and an entry, 7-17-1784, 1200 acres on No. Fork Licking. Two others were made for Samuel, Jr., on that day for 500 acres each. Both Jr. and Sr. are taxed in Fayette County, 9-19-1789. Since Moses Boone, his son-in-law, is also in Jefferson County, we believe the latter one is our ancestor. A Samuel is also recorded on tax rolls of Fayette County, Kentucky, but our ancestor died in Shelby County, Kentucky, as did his wife.

"Squire and Samuel Boone loaded up in 1787 and floated down the Ohio River to the Mississippi. They unloaded at Chickasaw Bluffs on the east bank of the Mississippi River in what is now Northern Mississippi. He remained there a year, but Squire went on to New Orleans. Samuel missed the marriage of his daughter, Rachael, to Alexander Hamilton which occurred 6 Dec. 1787 in Jefferson County where the Merrifields lived. Spraker on p. 610 reports, erroneously, Rachel's marriage to Alexander Mansfield.)

"Samuel died in Shelby County, Kentucky, about 1805 and his wife, Jane, resided afterwards in the home of her daughter, Hannah, wife of Moses Boone (Squire^5, Squire^4, George^3) until her death on 2 Jan. 1846, also in Shelby County. She was known as "Little Granny" to distinguish her from "Big Granny" Jane (Van Cleave) Boone. Hannah and Moses had lived on Brashear Creek since 1786. This is reported in some places to be in Kentucky but we know Moses went to Indiana about 1805 and lived an outstanding public life there until his death about 1852. Other information indicates she may have resided with Enoch Morgan Boone at the mouth of Otter Creek, Kentucky, along with Jane (Van Cleve) Boone related above. The Squire Boones lived for a time in Winchester, Virginia, about 1751 where the Samuel Merrifields lived.

Descendants of Squire Boone,Jr.

Dau. of William McIntosh (B) 1821 and Emily Parker, his wife.

Gr. Dau. of George McIntosh (B) 1788 and Elizabeth Boone,his wife.

Gr. Gr. Dau.---- of Moses Boone and Hannah (Boone) Boone,his wife.(They are cousins)

Gr. Gr. Gr. Dau.---- of Squire Boone,Jr.

Gr. Gr. Gr. Gr. Dau. of Squire Boone,Sr. and his wife Sarah Morgan.

Squire Boone,Jr.(1734-1815) was a pioneer of Kentucky and was wounded in the defense of Boonesboro. While suffering from wounds he was elected to represent Boonesboro in the Virginia Legislature;and,he made such an eloquent appeal for aid for the brave defenders of the frontier,that he met with hearty response. He was cheated out of the land that he located in Kentucky, so,in 1806 he left there with his four sons and formed a new settlement where he died. He was buried (by request) in a cave near the summit of a lofty eminence. He was born in Bucks Co.,Pa. and died in Harrison County, Indiana.

I believe the name is a French name and was (originally)Bouche.
A little "Tail" on the "e" in "fancy" writing is often mistaken for an "r."
I believe it was pronounced "Booshay." Look at Bushey in these records.

Martin A. Miller. Says the Index.

2nd Wife: Margaret Carbin (wife) Of John Nicholas Miller.
Almira Corbin: Says the Index.

(3) Child: married: -Oct 1887. Rec. C-23.218.

(5) Same name ~~name~~ (2 of them in Index-but, not your Nancy according to dates.) Her parents are Joseph and Margrett Carbon. The other is Dau. of Thos. and Sarah Terrebaugh.
(1) Emanuel Miller married: 6 Aug. 1891. Rec. C-24.19.

(11) Married: 4 Oct 1900. C-24. Gives mother as: Elizabeth Corban.

(4) Is not given in Index.

I do not find the name of Boucher anywhere--so far.

For the other children the name of the mother given in the Index is Almira Corbin and not Margaret Carbin. Is this two sets of children given in one record? Don't Know - data sent me by Mrs. James Miller

I have not checked (yet) Hannah Carpenter.

Brief History - Ringo Family.

"Ringo Lineage."

AD. 1556 Ringo Family, Cannes, France. Family ran away with Calvinism (religion) France granted them permission to return to their old faith. *Perrie Ringo and six others were executed for destroying Church Property. The Ringo Family went to Holland, a place of refuge. There they could worship in their belief."

* I believe *Perrie could be *Pierre - a very common French given name.

Myrtle H. Hamblen

(also) *Pierre (*Perrie) could be the Gr. father of (2) See over.

Henry Bryan,brother of John Bryan,sons of Henry Bryan who lived at the time of the Revolution on the Brandywine in Newcastle,Delaware near Chads Fork which is in Pennsylvania .... (I have omitted the traditional history given). The grandfather John Bryan was born 1763,and spent most of his adult life in Beaver County,Pennsy.
*John Bryan(father of the author:) William Lowe Bryan was (b) in Pennsy. in 1811.*He was a minister of the U.B. Church He preached at many places,including New York City,but,Principally in Eastern Ohio and Bloomington,Indiana. He died,1887. His cousins Eliza and Martha Bryan became Mrs. Walpole and Mrs. Julian. *****
Another cousin,Rev. James O. Campbell has prepared a wonderful Bryan Record. ****
The name Bryan is not found in Scotch and Irish records;but,is found in English records as far back as the thirteenth century. -Vol. 29. Pages: 345-6.)

Ref. Vols. 28,29. Mar-Dec. 1932-33. Indiana Mag. of Hist.

Ibid. Pages: 343-345.

Henry Bryan and two sisters,all single came from Newcastle,Del. after the Rev. War and bought land about three miles s.w. of the present town of Centerville,Indiana.(Wayne Co.).They talked very little about their past. They were wealthy(or had been in Delaware.

They were merchants, importing fine dress materials, furs, et cetera. When they came west they brought great trunks full of fine silks, paisley shawls and other such luxuries, which were not displayed, but kept packed for years. They had been loyal to England (that is the Tories) while their neighbors on all sides were for independence; but, were all on good terms. Henry Bryan's brother John Bryan settled in Beaver County, Pennsy.

A family by the name of Crawford whose head had fought in the Rev. War, lived on the farm next to them, after they settled in Indiana. Henry Bryan married one of the daughters. * He was well educated-a teacher, etc.

Eliza Bryan one of the daughters lived in Centerville across from the M.E. Church for several years. Later went to live with a sister in Indianapolis-where she died.

Another daughter of Henry Bryan married married a young lawyer, Jacob B. Julian. They began housekeeping in two rooms in Muncie, Indiana; but, later returned to Centerville. ..... Jacob bought a vacant lot in the west part of Centerville....landscaped it...it was on a knoll...built a fine brick house with a latticed porch... and surrounded it with rare flowers, bulbs, and beautiful trees of many kinds. The persimmon trees grew into a fine grove on the west side of the lot. He sold the home to Oliver P. Morton. Jacob, then, bought the whole block, enclosed by what is, now, Morton Avenue on the west, Pennsy. R.R. on the north, First Street on the east and Plum Street on the south....

Mary, eldest daughter of Jacob B. and Martha (Bryan) Julian married James E. Downey of Indianapolis.. the Downeys afterward lived in Irvington (Marion Co.) They were parents of nine children. Julian Bryan Downey, the eldest. Daughter Rebecca married Prof. Alfred Holmes White of the Univ. of Mich. Rebecca, Julian next younger than Mary, married James L. Mason, a lawyer of Greenfield, Indiana. Both weddings were solemnized in Centerville. Martha, the youngest child was married in Irvington to Edgar A. Brown, an attorney in Indianapolis. Soon after her family moved from Centerville. Two Children, son, George, daughter Juliet, the wife of Dr. Christopher B. Coleman, Director of Indiana Historical Bureau.

John F. Julian, oldest child, and only son of Jacob and Martha Julian practiced law with his father both in Centerville and Indianapolis. He was named for John Finley, early Indiana Poet, author of "The Hoosier's Nest." Who resided in Centerville and was an intimate friend of the Family.

Dear Mrs. Handley;

Thank you very much for your recent letter. I have been compiling the sheets to show you what I have. I can tell from your letters that you are a very skilled & seasoned worker in this field.

I would like to have you concentrate on mother's lines right now. Family names of Ringo, Bryan (or Bryant), Miller, Christopher, Smith, Beaty & probably Morgan. I understand that there is a lot to be had on the Ringo family. Many of the descendents of early settlers by this name (George, Major etc.) still live in or near Clay County. I am in touch with some of them but sometimes their data conflicts with each other.

I am very curious to find out who Joseph Ringo was & more about Major & Morgan Ringo & their families

I am enclosing the aforementioned sheets & also a page of data taken from a manuscript loaned me by a Cousin. It has valuable information about early Clay & neighboring County histories.

See if you can find out who settled Correthers or Carruthers Twp. (It is no longer in existance.) This is a family name on dad's side & being an unusual surname it might have some tie-in to Greenup Correthers or his ancestors. (Greenup came from Kentucky as did the Ringos & Morgan Bryans family)

I am enclosing a check for 30.00 - it isn't much, I know & I'll send some more next month but right now its the best I can do.

I really do appreciate your work & I know God will bless you to find these records & people. My Prayers will be with yours for Success. God Bless You, & again, Thank You.

Sincerely,

L. Whitlock

RINGO FAMILY

Monday, Sept. 14, 1936.

Morgan - Bryan - Ringo Reunion.

The fifteenth reunion of the Morgan - Bryan - Ringo clan was held on the 13th.* at Forest Park, this being the thirteenth one held here in the Park, the first two being held in the orchard of the old farm house of Posey Twp. All families of the clan residing in this vicinity were well represented, as well as several from distant points.

The morning was spent in renewing old acquaintances and making new ones. At noon the group of more than 200 enjoyed a sumptious chicken dinner.

The guests from other points were: Hershell Ringo, O.O. Ringo and wife from Muncie, Ind. O.O. Ringo, being the president of the National Ringo Association Of America; Mr. and Mrs. George W. Brune, formerly of Woodburn, Oregon, but, now, living in Newark, N.J., and Jasper Ringo of Paris, Illinois.

Immediately after the noon meal, O.O. Ringo called a meeting, in the log cabin, of the officers of the National Ringo Association who were present. These were: O.O. Ringo, president, Walter B. Ringo, south of this county, fourth vice-president, Mrs. George Brune of Newark, N.J., treasurer, and Miss Pearl Finley, who acted as secretary pro-tem. President Ringo presided.

He announced that this was the first meeting of the National Ringo Association since it's recent election of officers. It was decided that since there are nineteen members of the clan known to be octogenarians, that the same shall henceforth be known as honorary members. It was further decided to waive the regulation in the By-laws, requiring a fee of one dollar per member, but, at this time to admit the 1200 or more Ringo descendants and in-laws without fee.

The president then called on Walter B. Ringo, grandson of Major Ringo, the Kentucky Pioneer who came to Clay Co., Indiana in 1833 and settled in Posey Twp. Among other things, W.B. Ringo said, "that his father the late Morgan Bryan Ringo, was one of the ten children of Morgan Ringo and his wife Elizabeth Bryan. Morgan Ringo, like his father, a sturdy pioneer of Kentucky birth and Dutch ancestry. He carried the United States mail on horseback through wilderness trails from Terre Haute, Vigo County, Indiana to Spencer, Owen County, Indiana, twice each week for a long period of time. Between times he made flat boats and such pioneer necessities." He M/Mary Ann McKinley, daughter of George Green McKinley, who was a native of Kentucky; and a contractor of public work. Morgan Bryan, soon became associated with his father-in-law in his contract work; at one time having the contract for construction of the Pennsylvania Rail Road from Harmony, east, including the Rock Cut, so recently widened on Road 40.

Major Ringo had a brother Joseph, who removed early to Oregon, Where he reared his family and had many descendants who still reside there; Mrs. Brune, now, of New Jersey, being one of this branch.

President Ringo, then closed the meeting  with a vote of thanks to the Clay County Historical Society for use of their cabin for the meeting; also, to all persons, relatives and otherwise who have given their assistance to him in his extensive on the Ringo Family History and Genealogy. By this research he has proven that the first Ringo emigrants were Holland Dutch and and settled in New Amsterdam(now,New York City) soon after 1600 and became a famous Knickerbocker Family.*

research

Albertus Ringo,son of Phillip Ringo,the first emigrant,was (b) 1656 in New York City. In 1679 he M/Jannetje Van Stutenberg, a daughter of Pieter Van Stoutenburg*and Aefje Tienhoven(natives of Holland) but,early emigrants to America. * They were the parents of (Judge) Phillip Ringo of the town of Ringoes,N.J.

Jacobus Van Stoutenburg,founder of the town of Hyde Park,was a brother of Jannetje (Van Stoutenburg) Ringo. The Stoutenburg Family were the original tulip growers in this country. The famous tulip garden of Pieter Van Stoutenburg was at what is now 120 Broadway,N.Y. where the great Equitable Insurance Building now stands. It is said that the first tulip bulbs brought to America,came over in the coat pockets of Pieter Van Stoutenburg."

The National Officers,then returned to the reunion group,still, about the tables under the trees. Mrs. Laura Morgan Spears,V.P. in the absence of Pres't. Myron Ringo,had called the meeting to order; and the following officers were elected for 1937.: Ray Morgan,pres't., Myron Ringo,V.P.,Morgan Corbin,Treas.,Mrs. Mollie Adams,Sec't.,Mrs. Morgan Corbin,Program chairman.

Mrs. Spears introduced Mrs. Brune of New Jersey;who explained a copy of the most extensive genealogical chart,printed by the Stoutenburg Family(Clan) in 1913;and said to have cost $4,000. It is most unusual,printed in concentric circles on heavy map paper,a yard square,beginning with the name of Pieter Van Stoutenburg in the center or hub,and continuing for ten generations of Stoutenburg descendants. Mrs. Brune,also,showed many pictures of Ringo homes and burial plats, both,in New York and New Jersey. She had just completed a large volume of data on the Ringo line,which she had made in triplicate,One copy for the Oregon descendants;one for the Chapter of (her) DAR in Newark,N.J.,and one for her own use. She,also,had copies of the Stoutenburg and Ringo coats of arms.

O.O. Ringo,also,had some extensive records for inspection. He has,recently,sent three volumes to Washington,D.C.,and is working on a fourth volume.

Several musical numbers were given by the Morgan boys of Harmony, and others. All of which was greatly enjoyed by all.

The 1937 reunion will be held at the same time and place.

This was a newspaper item. It did not state which paper. I imagine it was Brazil or Terre Haute Paper,but,name of paper and date were clipped off. I found it in an old Scrap Book at the Terre Haute Library. also,the copy of Cornelius' War Record and the (secondary) family record. (Sis Hamblen)

Notes:

Forest Park is in Brazil, Indiana. A very nice one.

Knickerbocker.

A person descended from the original Dutch settlers of New York; also any New Yorker.

Knickerbockers:

Wide breeches gathered in below the knee; now, a popular sports garment; also, called knickers.

Comments:

The Roosevelts were all Knickerbockers. Both lines: Teddy and Franklin D.
I say, again, Lincoln, McKinley and (2) Roosevelts (presidents) will be your lineage. (Sis. Hamblen.

Question: John Gouch, a Rev. Vet., said to be 2nd cousin of Daniel Boone, came to Eastern Kentucky(now Perry County)probably with his daughter Mary(Polly) who married John Campbell in N.C. (likely Ashe Co.) and came to Eastern Ky. about 1807/9. John Couch presumably died there. Any one knowing of a Couch-Boone connection, please write to the Boone Scout.

Bryan's Station.

"Grant's Fort was built in 1779 by Col. John Grant and Capt. William Ellis, the military leader of the Traveling Church, for the use of 20 or 30 families who came to Bryan's Station." A group of 60 Indians from Byrd's war party attacked it in June 1760, and burned the Fort without taking prisoners. Forty men from Bryan's went to their relief and found two men named Stucker and a woman named Mitchell killed. The Fort was rebuilt in 1784. The site is 1 1/2 miles from Antioch Christian Church, near the border of Fayette County. - Ref.: (Bourbon Suits)

Squire Boone,Jr. and his brother Daniel built cabins and stockades near the Lotusville,Ky.,water front. One of Squire's children became governor of Indiana,Tipton Boone."His maw had him baptized 'Squire Heath Manly Marquise de la Lafayette Green Jennings Tipton Boone.'
Squire Boone,Jr. and W/Jane Van Cleve had 5 children. (4 boys). Jonathon,Moses,Isaiah and Enoch Morgan,none of whom became governor of any territory. But,Isaiah had a son with the unbelievable name,given above,a grandson of Squire! Another Question: John Couch, a Rev. Vet. said to be a second cousin of Daniel Boone,came to eastern Ky.(now,Perry Co.) prob. with his dau. Mary(Polly),who had married John Campbell in N.C. (likely Ashe Co.) and had come to eastern Ky. about 1807/9. John Couch presumably died there. Any one knowing of a Couch-Boone connection,please write the Boone Scout. Establishing such relationship will be of genealogical importance.

A Problem:Samuel Boone Blair of Levelland,Texas seeks to establish his ancestry from Isreal Boone(bro of Daniel),and the ancestry of his gr.gr. gr. moth.Tempie Ann Harris who M/Robert Boone, gr.gr.gr.son of Of Israel in Burnsville,N.C. a place which appers to be the ancestral habitation of the family. Mr. Blair has accumulated much valid data;but,also found much that conflicts. Viz.: Tempie Ann lists her birth date as 1840,but the 1860 census shows her to be 22 yrs. old,then. Her husband Robert's birth day is equally confused. The 1860 Census gives his age as 26 yrs. While his war record states that he was ae. 24 yrs.old in 1861. Mrs. Blair welcomes data.

It has been hard to find the parents of Nancy Linville Boone who married her 2nd cousin Alphonso Boone. (Jesse 6,Daniel 5, Squire 4,George 3.) 1 Feb. 1822. The name "Linville" suggested a possible connection with George Boone,a brother of Daniel, who had married Ann(Nancy)Linville;but,the couple had no daughter so named,nor as far as could be learned,no granddaughter.  John Boone listed in Callaway Co.,Mo. History among the Ch. of George and Ann(Nancy)Linville) Boone,and in "Pioneer Families Missouri". Still no birth date,wife nor children for him. The searcher,Mrs. A.O. Boone(then,of Fulton,Mo.) was loaned a Family History written by a member,then,deceased,in which she found John (b) in 1769,2nd son of George and Ann(Nancy) Boone. 6 children by his wife "Polly" were named. she persisted in her search and found found 5 more children-Nancy Linville,being one. John's wife is thought to be(at this point) Polly(Mary) Marris.
One of their daughters was named Delia Morris,and the marriage records of Jefferson Co.,Ky,showed that a John Boone married Mary Morris,6 Dec 1791.(Documentary Proof is lacking:)as to John's parentage,the surname of his wife and the ages of many of their children. But,the fact seems to be established that Nancy Linville Boone was a daughter,and that she did marry her cousin* Alphonso Boone.(* 2nd cousin),grandson of Daniel,Nancy being the granddaughter of George,brother of Daniel. Additional proof to the above will be appreciated.

(Same Page:)

After many years it is established: The wife of Josiah Boone is Hannah Henton,daughter of George H. and his wife Persis(Boone) Henton,who in 1717 owned land in Philadelphia Co.(later Berks Co. Pa. He was the emigrant ancestor of the family. George Boone 3 and his sons George and Squire,and grandson Josiah,owned adjoining land as did Mordecai Lincoln.
The minutes of the Exeter(Quaker) meetings record that Josiah Boone(see my previous notes. Sis. Hamblen) was condemned for a "disorderly" marriage (in other words he married out of unity or with a non-member-my note. Sis Hamblen),and about the same time 30 June 1750,the marriage of Josiah Boone and Hannah Henton is registered in St. Gabriel's Church,Berks Co.,Pa.(Ref.: "My Henton Lineage." - Dr. George Earle Henton.(Additional data so welcome.)

PROVEN FACTS.

William's parents were Robert Boone(Jeremiah 8,Thomas 7, Jonathon 6,Israel 5,Squire 4,George 3) and Temple Ann Harris,a daughter of William and Emmie(Anna) McMahan Harris. William was the oldest of their 4 children,(b)1854, No. Car. He M/Nancy Caroline Nashburn(wonder if this is not Washburn. Sis Hamblen.)(b. 27 Jan 1854,Yancy Co.,N.C.) 4 Oct 1875 at Laurel Chapel. William's sister M/George Silver. William and Nancy had 4 ch.: Lon,Ran,Paris and Bert. William was a farmer and operated a blacksmith shop. Nancy d/1895;and in 1896 William M/2 Miss Lulu Bell Shoemake. They had 7 children.

So much has been written about the famous Daniel Boone,who discovered Kentucky,and who with his wife Rebecca (Bryan) Boone their family and other brave souls who followed the wilderness road through the Cumberland Gap to settle in Kentucky;but,so little is known about their son Daniel Morgan Boone.
Daniel and Rebecca's first son James when a boy of 16 years was killed by Indians;Israel,the second son was killed when he and his father was attacked by the Indians,and,thus Daniel Morgan became the eldest surviving son.
It was in 1787 that he left his home in Ky. and crossed Ind. and Ill. He was a trapper and set his traps as far west as the Blue near Independence,Mo. It was June when he arrived at the little Village of St. Louis,Mo. He was destined to play a very important part in the early history of Mo. He was appointed by Gov. Lewis Merriwether as one of a committee of three to build block houses(Note: It is said that he was the first white man to enter what is now Jackson Co.Mo.) in 1809. He and his brother Nathan were commissioned officers in the War Of 1812. In 1814,with his brother Nathan laid out and surveyed the first cross state road from St. Charles to Old Franklin. In 1820 he took a prominent part in the new Gasconade Co. He took his brother Jesse's place as a member of the committee appointed to select a site for the new State Capitol,and the selection was approved 31 Dec. 1821. In 1825/26,he was appointed Agriculturist for the Kansas (or Kaw) Indian Agency. He was appointed Commissioner,together with Major Berryscroft and Stephen Cooper in 1837,to fix the Missouri-Iowa boundary line.,that had long been in dispute.(Some omitted-not pertinent to record).
Daniel Morgan Boone (d) 1839. His wife (d) 1850. They were bur. in Boone-Hays cemetery-N.W. Corner of 63d and Brooklyn in Kansas City,Mo. The grave was unmarked until 25 Sept 1960 at 3.00 P.M. At that time the monument was unveiled by Master Bryant Shakelford Callaway, a 4th gr grandson of Susanna (Boone) Callaway, who was the sister of Daniel Morgan Boone.

Daniel Boone's mother Sarah Morgan was the daughter of Edward Morgan (b) 1700.

"The house that I live in-the home of Daniel Boone's mother is one of the first 10 original houses in this community,about 1698/1700;but,doubt that the mother was born here in this house. However I know it did exist shortly thereafter as in 1704/05 the Pike was cut through from Philadelphia just as far as Edward Morgan's home.
An old toll gate stood opposite here,until about 55 years,ago. In those toll gates were always at the ends of the pikes;and, since a well know road started right next to here,that is double proof that this certain pike ended here.
I searched for the first deed among old musty papers. Evidently the first one was not recorded;as the second one is the earliest one found.
Edward Morgan and his family moved from here in 1713. Squire Boone and Sarah Morgan were M/1720 in a meeting house two miles from here. She was,then,20 years old. ***

In 1825,a William Fisher brought a suit in Chancery in Fayette Co.,Ky. against certain heirs of Samuel Boone(Squire 4,George 3,),who were cited as defendants,but,even yet,information about this brother of Daniel and his family is not complete. Same Edition. Page: 112. for the above records.

Sarah was the only daughter of Squire Boone,Jr. and his wife,Jane Van Cleve. Her father gave her land of her own on Fox Run,4 miles north of Shelbyville,Shelby Co.,Ky. It was on this land that Sarah and her husband,John Wilcox son of George(Wilcockson)of Rowan Co.,N.C.) settled following their marriage at Lynch's Station in 1791. Her father a minister of the Gospel performed the ceremony. John Wilcox set about improving the property,and there made a home for the 13 children who were born to them. In later years John and Sarah related to their children some of their early hardships,as months without bread or vegetables and meat without salt.
It was from this home that those children went forth to contribute so much to the settlement and of Ky. and Mo.,and from it John and Sarah passed to their eternal rest,John on 18 Oct. 1819,and Sarah,26 June 1846,according to the settlement of the personal estate of John Wilcox,(Rec. Shelby Co.,Ky.,Jan. Court,1820) John had succeeded in accumulating considerable property. Left a widow with several small children,Sarah was faced with the challenge of rearing and educating them. That she succeeded in this formidable task is evident in the records of her children,which we recogonize as noteworthy. In 1826,Sarah sold land,Shelby Co.,Ky.,Deed Book U-1), where we find the 4 younger children listed as 'infants',Edwin being the youngest,but the determination of Character which was an integral part of Sarah's inheritance from her parents enabled her to provide home and education,two sons graduating from Louisville Medical College,Dr. George Boone Wilcox and Dr. Edwin Wilcox.(for conclusion-see July Scout.)

FIRST SIGHT OF KENTUCKY.

DANIEL BOONE.

BY BENSON J. LOSSING.

DANIEL BOONE has ever been regarded more as a great hunter, than as a bold and enlightened pioneer in the grand Westward march of civilization in America. This is a grave error, deeply impressed upon the popular mind, and yet there is ample excuse for it. Some of his most daring achievements in conflicts with the Indians were connected with his earlier hunting excursions beyond the lofty ridges of the Southern Alleghanies and the Cumberland Mountains; and when, in the "sere and yellow leaf" of his life, he felt the ingratitude of his countrymen, he penetrated the deep wildernesses beyond the Mississippi, and spent his old age there in trapping otters and beavers. The scenes of these widely separated periods of his wonderful life have been the themes of romance and of song, while those of the more quiet intervening years in which the usefulness of his pioneership as the path-finder for the march of empire was developed have been overlooked, or but briefly noticed by the grave historian and political philosopher. Therefore the name of Daniel Boone is always associated with wild adventures with bears and savages, and seldom with civilization and its beneficent achievements. Upon the latter, however, his fame will rest more solidly in the future ages than upon the more material features of his career. The hunter and backwoodsman will appear only as the dim shadows cast by the pioneer and the patriot.

George Boone, the grandfather of Daniel, was the first of that family who emigrated to America. He came from Bradnich, near Exeter, in that quiet, beautiful garden-region of England, the County of Devon. He became a large landholder in the rich but then wilderness region of Berks County, in Pennsylvania. He also purchased lands in Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina, and, it is said, owned the soil and laid out the village of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia. He had need of many fertile acres, for he brought with him nine sons and ten daughters. Population was then sparse in all the colonies, for it was in the year 1717—almost a century and a half ago. There was room enough for large families.

One of George's sons was named Squire. He wooed and won Sarah Morgan, who was of Welsh lineage, and they became the parents of Daniel, the great hunter and pioneer of Kentucky. He was born near Bristol, on the banks of the Delaware, in Berks County, Pennsylvania, on the 11th of February, 1734. At that time his family belonged to the Society of Friends, though they seem to have been originally of the Church of England. His opportunities for acquiring education were very limited. It was in one of the "people's colleges," built of logs, where he was taught the mysteries of school learning; and little did he owe to the pedagogue for that knowledge with which he made his way in after-life.

When Daniel was three years of age his father settled at Reading, in Bucks County, then a frontier town. There he learned to love the forest, and was taught much of the craft of the woods by intercourse with the Indians who abounded in that vicinity. These were the most important lessons for his use in after-life, and he appears to have profited largely by them. He became expert in the use of the rifle, and loved the excitement of the chase.

Squire Boone, having a large and growing family, finally removed to the upper regions of North Carolina, near the South Yadkin. Daniel was then nineteen years of age, and full of physical and mental vigor. The events of the journey through Maryland and Virginia wrought powerfully upon his mind; and when their destination was reached, and the routine of daily toil demanded the exercise of all his powers, he felt an irrepressible desire to go out from the habitations of men and enjoy the perfect freedom of the wilderness. He had already plumed himself for flight when Cupid cast a tether about him, and bound him for a season to his home and neighborhood. A few other settlers were seated upon the Yadkin. Among them was a Scotch-Irishman named Bryan, whose daughter, Rebecca, became the object of young Boone's first love. Thus the already expert hunter was enticed from the forest, and, with Rebecca Bryan as his wife, he became a quiet farmer on the banks of the Yadkin, further up toward the mountains than the home of his father. There he built his solitary cabin; but ere long other adventurous young men like himself came thither, and soon from a dozen hearths around him went up the blue smoke on the morning air.

As the settlement increased Boone became restive. He felt crowded by neighbors within trumpet-sound; and the tales of hunters who had penetrated the wilderness to a greater depth than his adventurous foot had trodden filled him with aspirations for the excitements of the forest. Over the mountains westward of him lay an undiscovered country, traversed only by the wild Indian, the buffalo, the deer, and beasts of prey. Even the country between the Yadkin and the blue hills on the western horizon was equally unknown, except to a few hunters who had stood at the eastern foot of those mountains, from whose summit no eye of white man had yet gazed in wonder. Toward those fields of adventure the bold spirit of Boone was continually drawn, as if by the inexorable law of gravitation; and yet it was not the love of excitement alone which formed the attraction—it was even its opposite. His disposition was mild, his heart simple, and he loved peace. The distant roar of the gathering political storm which finally swept over the land in the form of a Revolution disturbed him; and the love of quiet was a powerful motive to seek the solitudes of the grand old forests. A similar spirit of adventure and love of peace stirred the breasts of others, and they all waited for some pioneer to lead the way that they might follow.

About the year 1748 Dr. Walker and a small party attempted the exploration of the country beyond the highlands, but they only reached the eastern borders of Kentucky, and accomplished little else for their contemporaries and for posterity than the demonstration of the fact that the lofty range of mountains might be scaled, and that a glorious country lay beyond. This was much, for it was the unbarring of the door which opened upon the theatre where the great drama of growing empires has since been in progress.

About twenty years later, John Finley and a party of hunters penetrated the region beyond the mountains to the Kentucky River, and roamed over a portion of the fertile soil of Tennessee. These men, in their explorations, became filled with the enthusiasm of a Columbus, and explored the new-found world with eager delight. They were men of action, and performed history without making records. But little is known of the details of that expedition, except what tradition has preserved of it. Yet posterity owes to Finley a debt of gratitude, for he opened a pathway to the wilderness and led Daniel Boone into it.

The narratives of Finley made a deep impression upon the mind of Boone, and found quick responses in his aspirations and partial experiences. He had already, in hunting excursions, penetrated the valleys along the head-waters of the Holston, in southwestern Virginia; and in 1764 he had stood within the eastern border of Kentucky, and bathed in the waters of the Cumberland River. Then he had a two-fold object —to hunt and to see the country, and report to a company of land speculators concerning it. Now, excited by an irrepressible desire to go where Finley had been, he arranged a party of six, consisting of himself, the Pioneer, John Stewart, Joseph Holden, James Monay, and William Cool, and started on the most important exploring tour westward which had yet been undertaken. They left their homes on the Yadkin on the first day of May, 1769. On the 7th of June they were on the banks of the Red River, a tributary of the Kentucky (Kain-tuck-ee), in the present Morgan County. They had traversed a mountainous country through many perils; and now, says Boone, "from the top of an eminence we saw with pleasure the beautiful level of Kentucky." That eminence was the Pisgah from which those pioneers of civilization looked into the glorious promised land.

For six months these bold men traversed the central and northern portions of Kentucky, in the midst of numerous kinds of wild beasts, but unmolested by the few roving Indians whom they found hunting there. The land was a perfect paradise in beauty and productions. The forest was dark with the wealth of foliage; and in sunny openings lay beautiful savannas, covered with luxuriant grass and decked with the most gorgeous flowers. Upon these, and at certain places on the streams, immense herds of buffaloes were seen. The majestic trees were festooned with vines, from which, in early autumn, hung grapes as luscious as those of Eshcol. The climate was delicious. Even when December came, and northern lakes and rivers were fast ice-bound, flowers still bloomed where the hunters trod, and they felt an enchantment in the scene and the novel excitement which bound them to the wilderness. They established a regular camp, and there, early in December, they prepared to spend the winter.

At that moment of fancied security danger brooded over them. While Boone and Stewart were rambling on the banks of the Kentucky River, toward the evening of a pleasant day, some Indians rushed from a thick cane-brake and made them prisoners. They were plundered of every thing, kept close captives for a week, kindly treated according to savage fare, and then at midnight, when the captors were all asleep, they escaped. Stewart had fallen into slumber, when Boone, rising cautiously, awoke him gently. Heavy was the sleep of the Indians. The two hunters moved silently, secured their guns, sped lightly from the cane-brake to the open forest, and through their excellent knowledge of woodcraft they found the way to their camp. It was a desolation. The Indians had plundered it, and Finley, Holden, Monay, and Cool were never heard of afterward. Boone and Stewart were left alone.

About this time Squire Boone, Daniel's brother, came into the wilderness with a single companion in search of the hunting and exploring party, and found the two lonely companions. Very soon after that happy meeting Stewart was killed by the Indians, and Squire Boone's attendant returned home. The two brothers were thus left alone among the wild beasts and equally savage men, several hundred miles from their families and the abodes of civilization. They built themselves a cabin for personal shelter and the security of their winnings in the chase—for they hunted every day during the entire winter. Success made them ambitious; and on the first day of May, 1770, Squire Boone departed for home to procure a supply of ammunition and horses, with which to prosecute the chase another season. "I was," says Daniel, "left by myself, without bread, salt, or sugar—without company of my fellow-creatures, or even a horse or a dog."

What a picture did that solitary white man in the vast wilderness present! His outside garment was a loose open frock, made of dressed deer-skins. His lower extremities were covered with leggins, or drawers, of the same material; to which moccasins for the feet were appended. The broad collar of the frock and the seams of the leggins were adorned with fringes. His under-garments were of coarse linen. A leathern belt encircled his body. On his right side was a hatchet, to be used as a tomahawk in fight, if necessary; on his left was a hunting-knife, powder-horn, bullet-pouch, and other indispensable appendages; and in his hand was his trusty rifle, his constant companion, protector, and friend.

What a moral picture did the two brothers present! One remained upon the spot where he had planted the first seed of settlement in building a cabin to watch and nourish it—for, as he said, he was "an instrument ordained to settle the wilderness;" the other, filled with fraternal regard and highest courage, was traversing a wild country, five hundred miles in extent, to cheer their kinsmen with glad tidings of Daniel's safety, and to procure strength for the plant of civilization then germinating on the banks of the Kentucky River. The mission of both was faithfully accomplished.

ESCAPE OF BOONE AND STEWART.

Boone was now six-and-thirty years of age, in the prime of vigorous manhood. For three months he was alone in the forest, exposed to dangers every moment, yet a stranger to fear. He made quite long journeys over northern Kentucky; and on one occasion, while standing upon an eminence, he saw the Ohio River, then filled to the brim, and flowing in solitary grandeur. He seldom slept in his cabin, for the Indians had discovered it, and he had frequent evidence of their having visited it during his absence. So he slumbered in the thick cane-brakes at night, and hunted all day with vigilant eyes. At length, on a sultry morning in August, while dressing a fine buck near his cabin, heavy footsteps startled him. The promise of his noble brother to return with horses and supplies was fulfilled. There he stood with two fine animals, well laden, and he was the bearer of joyful words to the solitary woodsman, for they told him of the health and happiness of his Rebecca and their children.

From the time when Squire Boone returned until the next spring the brothers explored the country in various directions, gave names to the rivers, and in March, 1771, they returned to the banks of the Kentucky, and dedicated the spot where they had parted and met again as the place for a settlement—the place whereon to lay the corner-stone of an empire. For eight months they had traversed the wilderness, every hour shielded by God's providence, for they met with no accident nor ever encountered the red man as a foe. Having made himself familiar with the country, Daniel yielded to his heart-yearnings for home, and departed for the Yadkin to embrace his family, and bring them with him into the beautiful land which he had discovered, where there was ample room. How gladly we would listen to a detailed narrative of that homeward journey, the delights of the domestic reunion, and the curious wonder of his neighbors, who had long regarded him as lost! But Boone was a man of few words, and he sums up the entire series of events in the simple sentence, "I returned safe to my old habitation, and found my family in happy circumstances." He had been absent nearly two years.

It was almost thirty months before the Boones completed their preparations to return to the Kentucky. They were strong in faith and courage themselves, but it was difficult to persuade their neighbors that it was better to go into the wilderness than to remain in their safe and quiet homes on the Yadkin. They thought of the fate of Finley and his companions, and their fears overcame their aspirations. Of all the settlers there, Daniel and Squire Boone alone, with their families, ventured upon the great enterprise. With horses, and cattle, and necessary furniture, they left the Yadkin on the 25th of September, 1773, upon a mission of the magnitude of which they had no adequate conceptions.

Yet they were not destined to go alone after all. The narratives of the Boones had stirred adventurous spirits in other settlements, and in Powell's Valley they were joined by five families and forty well-armed men. Thus were brought together the elements of a colony, with promises of success; and, with high hopes for the future, they pressed toward the wide Cumberland Gap, near the junction of the three great States of Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Squire Boone, who had made the journey four times in one year, was their guide, and with uninterrupted march they approached that majestic gateway in the mountains toward the middle of October. Upon Walden's Ridge some of the young men fell back to collect the scattered cattle. One of these was the eldest son of Daniel Boone, a lad of seventeen years. A war-party of Indians, unknown and unsuspected, had been hovering upon the flank and rear of the emigrants for two days. They fell upon the young men. The main body of the adventurers heard the sound of conflict and rushed to the spot. It was too late. The Indians had accomplished their work and fled. Six of the young men had been massacred. Among these was the first-born of Daniel Boone.

That event was a dreadful blow to all, and broke the spirit of most of the emigrants. Sorrowfully they buried those six young men in the wilderness and then turned back. Boone and others of the strong men would have proceeded; but the tears of woman were potent. Hearts which knew no fear were softened and subdued by the griefs and terrors of the tender ones who leaned upon strong arms for protection. They turned back; yet they did not go to the Yadkin. They halted among the settlers on the Clinch River, in Virginia, where numbers gave strength and security against the Indians. There Boone remained quietly during seven months, while his fame as a hunter and pioneer explorer was told by many lips in highest social circles in Virginia and North Carolina. That quiet was during the slow lifting of the curtain which disclosed another act in the drama of Boone's wonderful life. Let us glance a moment at the records of general history, for now they begin to take cognizance of the great Pioneer.

Our old War for Independence was then rapidly kindling, and in Virginia were many scarred soldiers of the late conflict with the French and Indians, who had not yet received the reward due for their services. True, the Colonial Government had generously voted them lands beyond the mountains, but they were almost as inaccessible to the individual soldier as a quarter section in the moon. The Government, contented with its show of generosity in voting lands to the soldier, did not stop to reflect upon the difficulties that lay in his way in obtaining it. Indeed that country wherein the grants lay was so vaguely defined in the minds of legislators and magistrates that they scarcely knew whether there was an immense inland sea or a paradise of fertile acres beyond the lofty highlands in the West, until the explorations of Boone settled the question. Then they became aware that a noble domain was there, inviting the hand of industry to beautify and enrich it by culture.

Accordingly, in 1773, Governor Dunmore sent thither a party of surveyors under Captain Bullit, a companion in arms with Washington at Fort Duquesne. They went down the Ohio to the Falls, where the city of Louisville now stands, made many surveys in the adjacent region, and verified all that Boone had declared concerning that country. Other surveyors followed, and in the spring of 1774 Captain James Harrod, with forty men, descended the Ohio, and on the site of Harrodsburg planted the first corn ever deposited in the soil of Kentucky by the white man's hand. Another party followed the Kentucky River far up into the interior, and thus, through the impulse given by Boone, adventurous Virginians were soon traversing the numerous buffalo paths of central Kentucky in many directions.

A bolder and more competent leader than had yet gone from Virginia — one who could be a chief in the great work to be accomplished—was needed, and Lord Dunmore solicited Daniel Boone to go to the Falls of the Ohio and conduct the surveyors and other parties, then in Kentucky, or preparing to go thither. Boone immediately complied with the request, and in the spring of 1774 he bade adieu to his family and the settlers on the Clinch River, and with a single companion hastened to the coveted field of action, filled with gratitude for such an opportunity to advance those grand schemes of settlement in Kentucky to which his life was now dedicated. They did not take the safer way of the Ohio, but went over the Cumberland Mountains, and by the very graves of the six young martyrs they made their way through the wilderness, continually surrounded by the greatest perils. Boone says they made a tour of eight hundred miles, through "many difficulties," in sixty-two days.

Here and there in the wilderness, where hardy men had built cabins or established temporary camps, Boone was greeted with joy as the great Pioneer, and his advice to them was law. To James Harrod and his party he carried intelligence of the hostilities of the northern Indians, and advised them to join another party. They heard and heeded, but lingered too long. On the 20th of July a war-party of Indians fell upon them, killed one man and dispersed the rest. One of Harrod's party, it is said, fled down the Ohio in a bark canoe, continued his flight down the Mississippi to New Orleans, and did not tarry until he had made a sea voyage to his home in Philadelphia! There was reason for alarm, for this attack of the savages was the first of a series. The warlike Shawnees saw, with anxiety, the encroachments of the white man upon the rich possessions of their ancestors, and they resolved to exterminate those already there, and thus crush the spirit of emigration. To accomplish this they mustered strongly in the country bordering on the Great and Little Miami rivers, and, led by the celebrated chief Cornstalk, they gave battle to eleven hundred Virginians under General Andrew Lewis, in August, 1774, at Point Pleasant, where the Great Kanawha empties into the Ohio. It was the bloodiest battle the Virginians ever had with Indians, and seventy-five of the sons of the Old Dominion were killed, and one hundred and forty wounded. By it, however, the power of the Indians was broken for the time, and peace ensued. In all this the hand of Boone was clearly perceived, and the red man marked him as his most dreaded foe—not as a marauder, but as the leader of a movement to deprive him of his inherited domain.

Having performed the various duties assigned him Boone returned to his family on the Clinch River, and passed the ensuing winter in hunting. Governor Dunmore was perfectly satisfied with the way in which the Pioneer had executed his commission, and he testified that satisfaction by giving him the military command of three garrisons on the frontier, established as a protection against the Indians.

And now a new scene in the drama opened. Virginia determined to encourage settlement in Kentucky, and offered, as a free gift, four hundred acres of land there to any person who should agree to build a cabin, make a clearing, and plant Indian corn. Many of these settlements were commenced after the battle at Point Pleasant; and when Boone returned to his family he found many of the settlers there desirous of going into the wilderness.

About that time an extraordinary movement, in which Boone became an actor, was commenced. Richard Henderson, a native of Hanover County, Virginia, a man about forty years of age, of strong mind, brilliant talents, but deficient in education and general culture, and then a resident of Granville County, North Carolina, planned a scheme of land speculation more extensive than any known in the history of our country. By the force of his genius he had arisen to the bench of the Superior Court of North Carolina, where he became conspicuous in opposition to the Regulators in 1771. They drove him from his seat and closed all the courts in that region. He had amassed a considerable fortune, but at the time in question he was involved in pecuniary difficulties. Bold, ardent, and adventurous, he resolved to go beyond the mountains, and there, in that beautiful land traversed by Boone, found a colony and become a lordly proprietor. Under pretense of viewing some back lands he went into the Cherokee nation, and with ten wagon-loads of cheap goods, a few fire-arms, and some spirituous liquors, he purchased from the chiefs of that nation a tract of land one hundred miles square, lying between the Kentucky and Cumberland rivers—one of the finest regions west of the mountains. He had seven associates in the scheme; namely, William Johnston, Nathaniel Hart, John Tuttrel, David Hart, John Williams, James Hogg, and Leonard Henley Bullock. These formed the celebrated Transylvania Company which occupy such a prominent place in the annals of that period. Having arranged all the preliminaries, Henderson, in March following, in behalf of his associates, met the Cherokee chiefs and twelve hundred warriors in council at a fort on the Wataga, a branch of the Holston River, where the purchase was consummated and ratified by treaty.

Daniel Boone was present at that council; and there is little doubt that he had been the confidential agent of Henderson and others in the examination of the tract, and in consummating the purchase from the Cherokees. Never was a man more faithful than he in keeping the counsel of himself or others; and it is the opinion of those best informed that he had been a secret agent in the scheme for several years. The moment the bargain was completed Boone was chosen to be the leader in the work of surveying and settling the domain. His first step was to lay out a road from the settlements on the Holston to the Kentucky River. He entered upon that duty with a company of strong and well-armed men, and the work was rapidly accomplished. They met with no serious obstacles, except such as nature offered, until they had arrived within fifteen miles of their final destination, on the Kentucky River, when, on the 28th of March, the Indians attacked them and killed two of their number. Two days afterward two more were killed and scalped by the savages. This was the beginning of severe conflicts with the red men. The pioneers sustained themselves manfully, beat off the foe, pushed forward to the Kentucky, and, on the site of the present Boonesborough, in Madison County, they built a fort, the first ever erected by the white man in that region. That rude fortress of logs was the theatre of stirring scenes during the War for Independence, then just commenced.

Other settlers soon followed, for Boone's fort appeared to them like a city of refuge in any hour of need, and they took courage from the thought. Yet that which gave the white people strength and confidence excited the jealous ire of the savages, and they hovered around this centre of civilization—this germ of dispossessing power in their midst—eager for an opportunity to strike an exterminating blow. But they were timid as well as wary, and when, soon after the arrival of Boone, Colonel Henderson, the "lord of the manor," came along the pathway prepared by the Pioneer, with a retinue of men and packhorses—forty of his strong followers, well armed and prepared for battle—the Indians withdrew in dismay, and hastened beyond the Ohio to tell their brethren there of the thunder-bolt that had fallen in the centre of their chosen hunting-grounds.

On his arrival Colonel Henderson gave the name of Boonesborough to the growing fort and its surroundings; and then he proceeded to people the land and organize a government for Transylvania, as the new State was to be called. Thousands of acres of that rich land were soon sold to emigrants; and by the end of April there were four settlements in Kentucky, named respectively Boonesborough, Harrodsburg, Blue Springs, and St. Asaph's. To these settlers Henderson sent an invitation to appoint representatives to meet him at Boonesborough for the purpose of organizing a proprietary government. They responded cheerfully, and on the 23d of May, 1775, the first Legislature in that region assembled under the shade of a huge elm near the fort. That body was composed of Squire Boone, Daniel Boone, William Coke, Samuel Henderson, Richard Moore, Richard Calloway, Thomas Slaughter, John Lythe, Valentine Hammond, James Douglas, James Harrod, Nathan Hammond, Isaac Hite, Azariah Davis, John Todd, Alexander S. Dandridge, John Floyd, and Samuel Wood. They chose Thomas Slaughter chairman, and Matthew Jewett clerk. The proceedings were opened with prayer by one of their number, the Rev. John Lythe of the Episcopal Church, who was one of the representatives from Harrodsburg. Colonel Henderson then addressed the Legislature in a manly and sensible speech. Notwithstanding his Tory proclivities, manifested during the Regulator movements in North Carolina a few years previously, were now exhibited in his speaking of the present as "the fifteenth year of the reign of his Majesty, King George the Third," he enunciated the true doctrine that the only legitimate source of all political power is the people, in these words: "If any doubt remain among you, with respect to the force and efficiency of whatever laws you may now or hereafter make, be pleased to consider that all power is originally in the people: make it their interest, therefore, by impartial and beneficent laws, and you may be sure of their inclination to see them enforced." Then, in the name of himself and associate proprietors, Colonel Henderson entered into a compact with the colonists, by which a free and liberal government was established over the territory. The most important features of this compact were: First, that the election of delegates should be annual. Second, perfect freedom of opinion in matters of religion. Third, that judges should be appointed by the proprietors, but answerable for mal-conduct to the people; and that the convention have the sole power of raising and appropriating all moneys and electing their treasurer. This covenant was signed and sealed by three of the members of the company, and by Thomas Slaughter in behalf of the settlers.

In that first Legislature of Kentucky Daniel Boone appears to have been very active. On the first day of the session he asked leave to bring in a bill for preserving game, and he was appointed chairman of a committee chosen for that purpose. He also introduced a bill for the improvement of the breed of horses. These became laws, with seven others, which were adopted at that session, which lasted only three days. Then, after a prayer by Mr. Lythe, the Transylvania Legislature adjourned till September. But it never met again. The purchase of Henderson and his company was annulled by the Virginia Legislature, which claimed a charter sovereignty over all that region. The State of Transylvania at once disappeared, and the broad domain of the proprietors was narrowed to a tract on the borders of the Ohio, twelve miles square, which the Legislature of Virginia granted to them. But Boonesborough was planted; the seed of a new empire was deposited in a rich soil, and from it, in due time, with rapid growth, budded and blossomed the fair State of Kentucky.

Having accomplished one great object of his life, in the construction of a fort as a nucleus of emigration and permanent settlement in the wilderness, the heart of Boone yearned for the endearments of wife and children, and the sweet delights of home. He had performed his duty well. The germ of a colony was under the cultivator's care, and he was delighted with the promise of numerous homes in that beautiful land.

At about the middle of June, when his fort was completed, Boone set out for home on the Clinch to bring his family into the forest, well assured that his devoted, trusting Rebecca would not hesitate to rely upon his sturdy arm and the shield of God's providence once more. The Pioneer was not disappointed. Cheerfully did that brave woman and her daughter prepare for the new land, and as cheerfully did the families of other adventurers, who resolved to accompany Boone, prepare for the perilous journey. Over mountains, through dark forests, and in deep cane-brakes, they made their way, unharmed by savage men or ravenous beasts. The company of wives and children were guarded by almost thirty guns until they approached the valleys of the Kentucky: then Boone and his family pushed on in advance; and just at the close of a bright day in September they reached the fort in safety, greeted by the hearty welcome of the little garrison that had been left there to protect the post and cultivate the soil. The loving wife and fair daughter of Daniel Boone were the pioneer women of the new State; they were the first of the gentler sex, from the homes of civilization, that ever stood upon the banks of the Kentucky River.

The autumn of 1775 was passed quite pleasantly by the settlers at Boonesborough. Although surrounded by fearful perils, they were not much troubled, for they did not appear. The climate was milder than that of the country east of the mountains, game was abundant in the forests, and luscious grapes hung in clusters from the trees. Their cabins were soon well prepared for the cold of winter, and an ample store of provisions was speedily gathered. Trees were girdled and felled, and before the frosts of late December came new garden spots were cleared and made ready for planting in the spring. Happily for the little company the Indians kept far away during the winter that followed, and there was real happiness in those rude cabins in Boonesborough fort.

Spring opened early and gloriously. The wild flowers came out in troops with the advent of the south wind and the vivifying sun of April; and with them came the family of Colonel Calloway, Boone's intimate friend. He had two daughters and Boone one. The three were just blooming into womanhood. They were constant companions in toils and pleasures, and at length they became companions in fearful peril. With the opening of spring the footsteps of Indians were perceived, and it was soon apparent that a war-party was prowling around the settlement. Vigilance and caution were awakened. The men never went to their labors without the rifle, and the women were enjoined never to go beyond the palisades except in the day time, and then not beyond a certain short distance from the fort.

On a warm day, at about the middle of July, the three girls (Betsey and Frances Calloway, and Jemima Boone), unmindful of frequent cautions, and intent upon pleasure, crossed the river in a canoe, and in the shadow of thick bushes and umbrageous branches that came down to the river's edge they amused themselves by splashing the water with their paddles, while the little tether-rope floated carelessly in the stream. The eyes of five stout, vigilant savages were upon them. One of them, noiselessly as a serpent, glided stealthily into the stream, seized the rope, and in an instant dragged the canoe into a nook out of sight of the fort. The loud shrieks of the girls were heard, but as the only canoe of the settlers was the one in which the victims were caught, they could not readily pursue. It was also believed that a large body of Indians were near, and Boone and Calloway were both absent.

CAPTURE OF THREE GIRLS.

Night had fallen when the fathers of the young captives returned. Preparations for pursuit were immediately made. Boone and Calloway appealed to the company for volunteers, and eight strong and true men took an oath similar to that uttered by Boone—"By the Eternal Power that made me a father, if my daughter lives and is found, I will either bring her back or spill my life-blood." At daybreak the following morning they were upon the trail of the savages, and on the 16th, forty miles away, they overtook them in the depths of an immense canebrake, just as the captors were kindling a fire to cook. Cautiously the pursuers approached the camp indicated by the smoke, and to their inexpressible delight they perceived the fair captives. Under the direction of Boone the party fell upon the savages, killed two of them, dispersed the others, and rescued the girls. This event, so thrilling, so full of adventure every moment, is recorded in these few words by the modest Pioneer himself: "On the 14th day of July, 1776, two of Colonel Calloway's daughters and one of my own were taken prisoners near the fort. I immediately pursued the Indians with only eight men, and on the 16th overtook them, killed two of the party, and recovered the girls."

From this hour the settlers were exposed to the fierce ire of the Indians, who seemed resolved to crush this bud of civilization before it should become unfolded in strength. The forests appeared to swarm with desperate savages thirsting for blood, and the nightly howl of the wolf was often mingled with the savage yell of the Indian. Flying parties, fleet and cunning, sped from station to station, cutting off the settlers in detail. These were shot at their plows by an invisible marksman, or slain while engaged in the chase; and prowlers would sometimes prostrate by a single bullet or swift arrow the first man that ventured at morning from the shelter of the palisades. Thus harassed by continual alarms the settlers passed the winter in great anxiety, and that beautiful region became to them truly "The Dark and Bloody Ground." The stout heart of Boone was melted at the sight of the suffering people, but it quailed not for a moment before the ever-present danger. But as the storm thickened, and the settlers heard of the war then raging on the Atlantic border, they became fearful of an alliance of the British with the savages of the wilderness. Indeed intelligence soon came that such an alliance actually existed, and that from the English garrison at Detroit war-parties would soon come with white men as leaders. This intelligence was like the low bellowing thunder precursory of a more furious tempest; and many of the inhabitants, taking counsel of their fears, abandoned their cultivated acres, left the wilderness, and took up their abode within the borders of civilization, there to await an auspicious period for their return. This desertion gave Boone greater uneasiness than any thing else; for in this weakening of the elements of inherent strength he foresaw the most frightful disasters to his cherished colony, and a presage of the end of settlements in Kentucky.

Early in April, 1777, the storm howled fearfully around Boonesborough and two or three other stations. On the 15th of that month a large body of Indians invested the fort, with the intention of striking the settlement out of existence at one blow. At that time the whole military force in the colony did not exceed one hundred men, a greater portion of the little army there, under the general command of the brave George Rogers Clarke, having left the country on account of the increasing perils. Only twenty-two armed men besides the settlers were in the fort at Boonesborough, and this little garrison made a noble defense. Quite a number of the Indians were slain; and having no means for climbing over the palisades, they soon abandoned the siege, after killing only one white man. But the victors were not much elated by their success, knowing full well that a large and better prepared party would soon appear to execute the bloody plan.

Vain efforts were now made to reinforce the garrison, and on the 4th of July two hundred assailants, one-tenth of them white men, surrounded Boonesborough. To prevent the neighboring stations from sending relief to the beleaguered capital, small parties of savages attacked these simultaneously. Strong in numbers the Indians were audacious, and there appeared little hope for the inmates of Boonesborough. But the Pioneer knew the Indian well, and his weakness in such a struggle, and he was fully prepared for the foe. Every weak point in his fortress, discovered during the attack in April, was strengthened; and for forty-eight hours the colonists sustained the siege, with the loss of only one man. Then the Indians, according to the simple record of Boone, "finding themselves not likely to prevail, raised the siege and departed."

Soon after this second siege forty-five men arrived from North Carolina. On the 20th of August one hundred men came from Virginia under Colonel Bowman. Now strong enough to act on the offensive, the pioneers sallied out, and for several weeks there were almost daily skirmishes with the Indians in some part or other of the colony. The savages were beaten in every encounter. They learned, at fearful cost, the superiority of the Long-knives, as they called the Virginians, and most of them were soon driven away far toward the Ohio. The few that remained prowled around the settlements as before, but seldom caught the white people off their guard.

For a while the Kentucky colony enjoyed comparative tranquillity. But that season of repose was short, and it was terminated by the saddest calamity that had yet befallen the settlers. Salt was much needed, and on the banks of the Licking River, in the present Nicholas County in Kentucky, there were copious springs that yielded the necessary article. But they were in the wilderness, full fifty miles north of Boonesborough. The journey thither and the labor there would be perilous. But salt was much needed, and Daniel Boone had seen and felt the necessity. He was a man not to be deterred from the performance of any duty on account of real or fancied danger; and so, placing himself at the head of a party of thirty men, he started on the 1st of January, 1778, for the "Blue Licks," to manufacture salt for the colony. The watchful Indians kept close upon their path; for whenever the great leader of the Long-knives was abroad in the forest the savages were on the alert, and by every stratagem they sought to make him their possession. They did not desire his life, for they knew him to be a brave and generous foe; but they were untiring in their efforts to make him a prisoner. And now their watchfulness was increased by curiosity, for they wondered much what the Pioneer and his men were going to do with the big kettles they were carrying.

For a month the salt-boilers worked on, with their rifles at their backs, and were unmolested. Boone, meanwhile, went out frequently alone to hunt for his party, and kept them supplied with food. In one of these excursions, according to one of his earliest (yet, it must be confessed, not the most reliable) biographers, he had a characteristic adventure. "One day," says Flint, "he had wandered some distance from the bank of the river. Two Indians, armed with muskets—for they had now generally added these efficient weapons to their tomahawks—came upon him! His first thought was to retreat; but he discovered, from their nimbleness, that this was impossible. His second thought was resistance, and he slipped behind a tree to await their coming within rifle-shot. He then exposed himself so as to attract their aim. The foremost leveled his musket. Boone, who could dodge the flash, at the pulling of the trigger dropped behind his tree unhurt. The next object was to cause the fire of the second musket to be thrown away in the same manner. He again exposed a part of his person. The eager Indian instantly fired, and Boone evaded the shot as before. Both the Indians having thrown away their fire were eagerly striving, but with trembling hands, to reload. Trepidation and too much haste retarded their object. Boone drew his rifle and one of them fell dead. The two antagonists, now on equal grounds—the one unsheathing his knife and the other poising his tomahawk—rushed toward the dead body of the fallen Indian. Boone placed his foot upon the body, and dexterously received the well-aimed tomahawk of his powerful enemy on the barrel of his rifle, and thus prevented his skull being cleft by it. In the very attitude of striking the Indian had exposed his body to the knife of Boone, and in it it was plunged to the hilt. This is the achievement commemorated in sculpture over the southern door of the Rotunda of the Capitol at Washington."

Undismayed by this adventure, Boone was out again on a hunting excursion on the 7th of February, when he was surprised by one hundred Indians and two French Canadians, who were on their way from the Ohio country to attack Boonesborough. On perceiving his danger the Pioneer attempted to save himself by flight, but the young braves were too fleet for him, notwithstanding his own sinews were yet supple, for he was only three-and-forty years of age. Making a virtue of necessity, he halted and surrendered gracefully. This conciliated the Indians, and they promised him generous usage. Yet he was troubled on account of the salt-boilers. They were too weak in numbers and means of defense to resist with any chance of success, and he could not warn them to flee to the fort. So, with wise forethought and his rare faculty of pleasing the savage, he arranged with them a surrender of the whole party as prisoners of war, hoping thereby not only to save their lives but also the fort at Boonesborough. The sequel vindicated his humanity and wisdom. Accordingly, on approaching the salt-boilers with his captors, Boone gave signs which made them surrender without hesitation, being promised humane treatment. The Indians kept their word. They also abandoned the expedition against Boonesborough, and retired to the Ohio country, with their twenty-eight prisoners, in triumph. Boone was afterward tried by a court-martial for this surrender. He was not only honorably acquitted, but was commended for his sagacity, it being apparent that his policy had, in all probability, saved the colony from utter ruin.

The captives were taken to old Chillicothe, the principal Indian town on the Little Miami, where they arrived on the 18th of February, having suffered much from fatigue and cold on the journey. On the 10th of the following month Boone and ten of his companions started for Detroit, under a strong guard, where the British commander gave rewards for prisoners and scalps. This prospect of gain no doubt caused the Indians to hasten back from the Blue Licks with their prisoners, instead of going on to Boonesborough on an uncertainty. The journey was a tedious one of twenty days through the wilderness, and during that time the Indians became so much attached to Boone that they refused a ransom of five hundred dollars which Governor Hamilton, the British commander, offered for him. Hamilton treated Boone and his companions with great humanity, and released the latter from Indian captivity by paying suitable rewards. But for Boone "their affection was so great" that they would not part with him, and they resolved to take him back with them to Chillicothe.

Boone had already laid his plans for escape, and with expert dissembling he made the Indians believe that he was perfectly satisfied with his situation among them. So, after staying a month at Detroit, to gratify their pride in exhibiting a prisoner so renowned, the Indians returned with him to old Chillicothe. He had made many useful observations of affairs at Detroit, and had won the attachment of the British officers and settlers there, who "were sensible of his adverse fortune, and touched with human sympathy."

In simple but graphic words Boone has given to the world, through the pen of Filson—the Boswell of the Pioneer—a record of his condition and conduct at this town. "At Chillicothe," he says, "I spent my time as comfortably as I could expect; was adopted, according to their custom, into a family, where I became a son, and had a great share in the affection of my new parents, brothers, sisters, and friends. I was exceedingly familiar and friendly with them, always appearing as cheerful and satisfied as possible, and they put great confidence in me. I often went a hunting with them, and frequently gained their applause for my activity at our shooting-matches. I was careful not to exceed many of them in shooting, for no people are more envious than they in this sport. I could observe in their countenances and gestures the greatest expressions of joy when they exceeded me; and, when the reverse happened, of envy. The Shawanese king took great notice of me, and treated me with profound respect and entire friendship, often intrusting me to hunt at my liberty. I frequently returned with the spoils of the woods, and as often presented some of what I had taken to him, expressive of duty to my sovereign. My food and lodgings were in common with them; not so good, indeed, as I could desire, but necessity made every thing acceptable."

Boone's apparent contentment allayed suspicion, and the vigilance of the Indians was greatly relaxed. Yet they did not put entire confidence in him. They counted his balls and measured his powder when he went out to hunt alone, and then compelled him to show what game he had shot, for they suspected that he might reserve some of each to use in making his escape. Boone, more cunning than the Indian, cut his balls in two, and used light charges of powder; and so he did save much ammunition for an hour of need. That hour came at last. For almost four months he had been anxiously watching for an opportunity to escape. At length they sent him with a party of Indians to the springs on the Licking to make salt. There he remained ten days; and on his return he found four hundred and fifty of the choicest braves at Chillicothe all painted and panoplied for the war-path toward Boonesborough.

No doubt Boone had been sent to the springs that these hostile preparations might not be made in his presence. He was greatly distressed, for his dearest earthly treasures were in danger. He resolved upon immediate escape, but carefully concealed his emotions. He applauded the war-dancers, joined in the sports, and all his acts deceived his jailers into the belief that their captive was the Indian's real friend, and that henceforth he was to be his companion in the battle and the chase. Suspicion slumbered, and before it was reawakened Boone was far on his way toward Kentucky.

It was on the 16th of June when Boone was allowed to go out on a hunt from which he never returned. With his trusty rifle, his thorough knowledge of woodcraft, and his strength of sinew, he was equal to the best Indian in the wood. For five days he sped through the wilderness one hundred and sixty miles, and ate but one regular meal during all that time. That was furnished by a turkey that he shot after crossing the Ohio. He had approached that stream with misgivings, for he was not an expert swimmer. He knew that it was full to the brim, for such was the condition of every tributary creek and river that he had crossed. As he approached the bank an old canoe lay half swamped in the bushes. He stopped its leaks; and in this vessel, so providentially provided, he paddled to the Kentucky shore. Once more upon that dear soil he breathed more freely; but he tarried not until, toward the evening of the 20th, he reached Boonesborough, almost exhausted by hunger and fatigue. To the astonished inmates he appeared like one risen from the dead. Impressed with the belief that he was lost, his family had returned to North Carolina. The Pioneer sat down and wept bitterly when the expected embraces of those he loved most dearly were denied him. But they were not all gone. His daughter remained, for she was affianced to young Calloway.

After the first gush of grief because of disappointment had subsided, Boone really rejoiced that his dear ones were beyond the reach of perils that yet menaced the colony. He found the fort in a dilapidated condition. Fully alive to the dangers that would soon surround them, he went to work vigorously to repair its defects and strengthen its weak and exposed points. Within ten days after his arrival Boonesborough was prepared for the foe, who it was supposed would soon appear in force, for they had made great preparations for the destruction of the Kentucky settlements.

But another prisoner had escaped and brought later intelligence from the barbarian camp at Chillicothe. The Indians were in doubt. Their scouts had brought information of the arrival of Boone at the fort, and the defensive preparations in progress there. They hesitated. A grand council of the nation was held, and for almost three weeks the grave chiefs and sachems shook their heads doubtingly when the hot young braves counseled an immediate march across the Ohio.

Encouraged by this intelligence, Boone resolved to act on the offensive; and accordingly he went out, with a party of nineteen of his best men, to surprise an Indian town on Paint Creek. When near there thirty savages, marching to join the expedition from Chillicothe, appeared in their path; and a "smart fight," as Boone called it, occurred. The Indians were dispersed, and the frightened residents of the town fled at the approach of Boone, and left the place desolate. Prudence now admonished the settlers to return to the fort. They retraced their steps, and reached Boonesborough, after an absence of seven days, without the loss of a comrade. They had taught the Indian an important lesson which made him more cautious. They had taught him that his own home was not secure from the strong arm of the Long-knives.

Boonesborough now suffered a severe ordeal. In August between four and five hundred Indians, commanded by Blackfish, the foster-father of Boone, and under the general direction of Duquesne, a Frenchman, at the head of a dozen Canadians, appeared before the fort, arrayed in all the wild trappings of savage warriors, with their faces hideously painted. They bore the flags of both England and France, but in the name of King George alone they summoned the fort to surrender. This was a formidable foe for sixty-five men to confront, while defended only by rude palisades and ruder log-houses. The Indians, mortified and exasperated because Boone had outwitted them and escaped, were now thirsting for vengeance. Their pride had been deeply wounded, and the possession of the Pioneer was their great desire. Boone knew his danger. He had learned the strength, resources, encouragements, and plans of the Indians during his captivity; and he properly regarded this as the critical hour when the fate of civilization west of the Alleghanies was to be determined.

Boone had sent an express to settlements eastward of Boonesborough, requesting the assistance of Colonel Arthur Campbell, a rough Scotch Highlander, who held military command there. Campbell had not arrived when the enemy appeared; and when the summons to surrender was made the sagacious Pioneer asked for two days to consider the matter. Feeling sure of his prey, and knowing it to be better to gain the fort by capitulation than by fighting, Duquesne granted the request. These were precious hours of relief to the besieged, and they well improved them. The women and children, taught caution by experience, were constantly engaged in bringing water into the fort from the spring; and cattle and horses and much provisions were brought through the postern gate, when the vigilance of the savages was relaxed during the two days of truce.

The eight-and-forty hours rolled away, and no succor arrived. Boone held a council of war—a council of desperate men. They would not trust Indian honor when it promised generosity and humanity, and they knew that Duquesne had no power to restrain the savagism of the barbarians if he desired to do so. The garrison therefore determined to fight, and to conquer or die. At the expiration of the time Boone mounted one of the bastions of the fort to speak, while Duquesne, with the politeness of his nation, became a courteous listener: "We thank you for allowing us two more days for preparation," said Boone. "We now defy you! Our gates are forever closed against you, and we will defend our fort as long as there is a living man in it!"

The besieged now expected an immediate attack. But the Frenchman was a diplomat, and exercised his functions skillfully. He informed Boone that Governor Hamilton of Detroit had instructed them to make the garrison prisoners, but not to destroy the fort, injure their persons, or disturb their property. He then proposed that Boone should send out nine chosen men to make a treaty to that effect, promising that when it should be accomplished the Indians would return peaceably to their homes beyond the Ohio. Boone's heart was touched. He remembered how kindly Governor Hamilton had treated him while at Detroit, and his faith was quickened. His trusting heart made his ears willing entertainers of the proposition. In behalf of his companions he acceded to the proposal; but he was cautious and keen.

After placing his garrison so that their rifles commanded the space selected for the conference, Boone and eight of the principal settlers went out and commenced the negotiations within less than two hundred feet of the palisades. The treaty opened fairly, but the terms were altogether too generous to be kept by those angry and bloodthirsty savages, who had been for weeks preparing for a plundering foray among the Kentuckians. Yet the treaty was signed by Boone and his companions; and then old Blackfish arose to speak in the presence of his adopted son, the fugitive Pioneer. The negotiators were all unarmed. It was a peaceful conference, and rifle and tomahawk had been left behind. Blackfish, with seeming friendship and well-dissembled honor, cunningly averred that it was customary, on such occasions, to ratify a treaty by two Indians taking hold of the hands of one white man. The perfidy was so transparent that it deceived no one. Boone saw that a tragic scene was about to be opened, and was prepared for the worst. He and his men consented to the "custom," and the cowardly Indians, two to one, grasped the hands of the white men. "Go!" shouted Blackfish. This was a preconcerted signal for the Indians to drag the white men prisoners into the depths of the forest. But there were strong sinews in the arms, and strong courage in the hearts of those stalwart pioneers, that the savage little dreamed of. They hurled their jailers from them, and in the midst of rifle-balls from the fort, and bullets, tomahawks, and arrows from the foe, the nine men escaped into the fortress, and securely barricaded the gate. All were unhurt except Squire Boone, the faithful brother of the Pioneer, who was slightly injured.

Now the siege began in earnest, and for nine days and nights the foe beat furiously upon the little wooden fortress. They kept up an almost incessant fire, while the men in the fort never returned a shot except with sure aim that seldom missed its mark. Every eye was vigilant, and every arm was employed. Men, women, and children worked bravely and nobly during the siege, in the midst of great perils, privations, and fears. Boone's daughter, who assisted in supplying ammunition, was wounded by a shot from the rifle of a negro deserter, who had placed himself in a thick-foliaged tree. He also killed one of the defenders of the fort, when the keen and experienced eye of Boone discovered him. Boone drew his rifle upon him, at a distance of one hundred and seventy-five yards, and when the siege was over the faithless negro was found beneath his tree with a bullet in his head. It had been a shot of which Leatherstocking or Indian John might have been proud.

The assailants tried first to burn the fort, then to undermine it, but the vigilance of the little garrison defeated all their purposes. They finally became discouraged; and, wearied with this uncommon labor, and seeing no chance for success, the besiegers fled, leaving behind them the bodies of many of their braves who had fallen by the rifle-balls of the hunters of Kentucky. They had killed only two in the fort, and wounded four; while their own ranks had been fearfully smitten. They had fired at random; and after they were gone the Pioneers picked up one hundred and twenty-five pounds of bullets, besides what stuck in the logs of the fort. This Boone thought "was certainly a great proof of their industry!" On the day after the siege was raised Simon Kenton, one of the boldest of the Kentucky Pioneers, with a companion with whom he had lingered behind after the battle on Paint Creek, in order to have a few more shots at the Indians, came galloping into the fort upon horses which they had stolen from the enemy. Thus ended in triumph for the defenders a most important siege, for upon its final result hung the destiny of a budding empire. It was marked, on the part of the defenders, with the coolest courage, the most consummate skill, and wonderful endurance; and yet the Pioneer—the brave and sagacious Daniel Boone—who had done and suffered so much, and so well deserved the plaudits of his countrymen, was met, while bearing the palm of victory, with a summons to a court-martial to be tried for misconduct, instead of receiving the honors which gratitude should have been eager to bestow. Let us charitably hope that the court-martial was only a friendly way of giving an official recognition of the great value of his services and of his patriotic character. That court, after full investigation, honorably acquitted him, and he did receive the grateful praises of his countrymen.

The escape of Boone from Chillicothe, followed by the affair on Paint Creek and the repulse at Boonesborough, greatly disheartened the Indians. Their pride was deeply wounded, and they were made to suspect that the sovereignty of the woods would speedily pass from them. The events of the present, and the fears concerning the future, made the spirit of the Shawnee bow in incipient grief; and from that time their power really waned. Boonesborough was never again assailed, for other forts and stations, erected between it and the Ohio, made it dangerous to the savage foot to tread on Kentucky soil. And the escape, the battle, and the siege had a salutary influence elsewhere. There was joy and confidence in Virginia when the news that fifty men had repulsed four hundred and fifty savages and frightened them beyond the Ohio became known; and the Legislature of that State, which had been tardy in affording aid to Major Clarke, now felt eager to complete the subjugation of the glorious country west of the mountains so nobly begun by Daniel Boone.

When the siege was ended, and security seemed to be established, the Pioneer left Kentucky and joined his family. In simple words he says in his narrative: "Shortly after the troubles at Boonesborough I went to my family, and lived peaceably there. The history of my going home and returning with my family forms a series of difficulties an account of which would swell a volume, and being foreign to my purpose, I omit them."

Boone had difficulties indeed such as almost crushed his sensitive spirit. The sturdy defense of Boonesborough had given confidence to those who desired to emigrate into Kentucky, and schemes for settlements there agitated many neighborhoods in Western Virginia and North Carolina. Laws respecting the location and occupancy of lands in that domain were enacted; and, as Collins says, "The surveyor's chain and compass were seen in the woods as frequently as the rifle. The great object in Kentucky was to enter, survey, and get a patent for land." Emigrants went thither by scores. Full three hundred boats arrived in the spring at the Falls of the Ohio, where St. Louis now stands, and new stations speedily appeared in various parts of northern and central Kentucky.

Boone almost felt that the land was his own; for his eye had surveyed it, and his own strong arm had done much in wresting it from the sway of the Indian, and he yearned for a permanent home on the banks of the beautiful Kentucky. But he was a law-abiding citizen, and, in compliance with legal forms, he prepared to take his family beyond the mountains once more, and seat them there. He converted much of his property into land warrants, and with about twenty thousand dollars in Continental money (then depreciating) he proceeded to Richmond, to take legal steps for acquiring possession of his desired domain. Many friends, knowing his integrity, intrusted him with funds to invest in the same way, and he left home with buoyant feelings. On the way he was robbed of every dollar; and then, as is too often the case, ungenerous lips whispered doubts of his faithfulness—whispered suggestions that he had "robbed himself," and so retained the money of his friends. He could well bear the loss of his own property, but when his honor—that honor which he cherished as the heart's-blood of his character—was suspected, he was almost unmanned. But conscious of his integrity, and full of the vigor of manhood (for he was then forty-five years of age), he turned his back once more upon civilization and its annoyances, and with his devoted wife and family returned to Boonesborough, after an absence of almost two years. He went there for a home and to retrieve his losses, but not to regain a good name; for that did not, after all, suffer much from the foul breath of slander, because his whole life and character contradicted all intimations that he was not an honest man.

Meanwhile George Rogers Clarke, Simon Kenton, and other bold pioneers, were working out the subjection of the Ohio country to civilization and republicanism, and making Kentucky stronger by removing causes of danger that had threatened it before. Clarke had penetrated the Illinois country in the summer of 1778, and surprised and captured the British posts of Kaskaskia, Cahokia, and Vincennes. A few months afterward, while acting as a peace-maker among the Indians in that region, and working successfully toward the pacification of all the western tribes who had been favorable to the British, he was informed that Colonel Hamilton, the commandant at Detroit (who treated Boone so courteously while in captivity), had retaken Vincennes. With a few men Clarke traversed the dreadful wilderness of a hundred miles from the Ohio, part of the way through ice and snow, and chilling water breast-high; and late in February he unfurled the stripes and stars over Fort Vincennes and a captured garrison. From that time British power on the extreme western frontier waned, and the Indians were too wise and wary to make incursions into Kentucky alone.

The British, however, determined to make a vigorous attack upon the Kentucky settlements, for they properly regarded them as the nurseries of their most dangerous enemies in the West. An army of six hundred Canadians and savages was organized, and furnished with six pieces of artillery; and in June, 1780, they left Detroit under the command of Colonel Byrd. They crossed the Ohio at the point where Cincinnati now stands, and went up the Licking River to the forks, gathering numerical strength on the way. Thence, with about a thousand men, Byrd marched for Ruddell's station. Unprovided with cannon, it was soon surrendered; but the acts of cruelty there performed by the savages, who could not be restrained, so shocked the commander that at first he refused to lead them against other stations equally exposed. The Indians promised obedience, and one more station (Martin's) was captured and plundered. Then the whole expedition returned to Detroit, leaving Boonesborough and other places unharmed. With their artillery the enemy might have wiped out every Kentucky settlement, and given the beautiful domain to the Indians again; but, strangely singular as it appears to the eye of man, these centres of civilization in the wilderness were spared.

Soon after Boone's return to Kentucky he projected new enterprises, for his restless spirit yearned for activity. He first went upon an expedition to the Blue Licks, the scene of his former misfortunes, to procure a supply of salt, accompanied only by his brother Edward. They left Boonesborough early in October, 1780, reached their destination in safety, and were returning, when they were fired upon by some Indians in ambush. Edward Boone was slain. The Pioneer saw his own peril and fled. The Indians pursued, and for three miles the chase was hot. Then the savages, who were left far behind, halted, but a furious dog belonging to them prolonged the pursuit. Boone turned, shot him dead, and leisurely and sadly made his way back to Boonesborough to tell the tale of his brother's death.

Soon after this, the dreadful winter of 1780 set in, a season known in our annals as "the hard winter," when, for forty days, not an icicle was disturbed by the sun in all the region from the Arctic Sea to the Roanoke, and westward to the Pacific. It bore with mighty force upon frontier and wilderness life. For almost three months the snow lay deep all over Kentucky. Many cattle perished. Wild beasts and birds were frozen, and the timid buffalo ventured among the tame cattle at the stations in search of food. Scarcity of provisions prevailed at all the stations, and gaunt famine looked fiercely in at the windows of the cabins. But the warm south wind came early, and the glorious spring sun brought life and beauty to the wilderness—such life and beauty as the emigrant delights to behold.

Boone lived in peace at Boonesborough during the year 1781, but the following spring the Ohio Indians, incited by the British and Tories, became bolder, and assaulted some of the more isolated stations. As the summer advanced they menaced Kentucky with fearful miseries, for they were led by a keen white savage named Girty, the offspring of an Irish sot and an American bawd. He was captured by the Indians at the time of Braddock's defeat in 1755, was adopted by a Seneca family, and became the fiercest savage of them all. For twenty years he had been the terror of women and children on the western frontier; and now, in joint command of some Indians with another miscreant named M'Kee, he was committing depredations in the neighborhood of Boonesborough. On the 15th of August Bryant's station was attacked, but the savages were repulsed. It was determined to chastise the invaders, and accordingly some men from Boonesborough under the brave Pioneer, others under Trigg of Harrodsburg and Todd of Lexington, one hundred and eighty in all, united at Bryant's station, and thence marched toward the known camp of Girty and M'Kee at the Blue Licks. They expected to be joined on the way by General Logan, then at Lexington.

On a hot morning (the 20th of August) the settlers came in sight of the savages on the opposite side of the river, held a council of war, and were advised by Boone to wait for Logan before attempting an attack. But the fiery Major Hugh M'Gary, of Harrodsburg, impetuous and imprudent, could not be restrained. He gave a shrill war-whoop, dashed with his horse into the stream, and, waving his hat, shouted, "Let all who are not cowards follow me! I'll show 'em where the Indians are!" The mounted men instantly plunged into the stream, followed by the footmen, and pressed across the swift current of the ford in wild confusion. Ascending the bank, they rushed forward to attack the enemy, and, as Boone had predicted, they fell into an ambuscade. Four hundred dusky warriors immediately arose upon their white foemen, and terrible was the battle that ensued. The Kentuckians fought like tigers, but the Indians, greatly superior in numbers, came up from the bushy ravines, closed in upon their doomed victims, and produced terrible slaughter.

Among the slain was Israel, a very promising son of Daniel Boone. The father saw him fall, and snatching up his body, yet warm with the currents of life fast ebbing, he attempted to carry it away in the retreat. A brawny savage, larger than any of his comrades, sprang toward him with gleaming hatchet, when Boone dropped his precious burden, turned, and with unerring aim shot the Indian dead.

The Pioneer escaped, but left behind him sixty-seven of his brave compeers on the bloody field, among whom were Todd and Trigg, beloved leaders in the wilderness. The loss of these friends grieved Boone sorely, but that of his son—the second of his offspring that had fallen by savage weapons—plunged the iron of sorrow deep into his soul, and he went back to Boonesborough dreadfully stricken in spirit. Although he well knew that a disregard of his prudent counsel had made hearths desolate, and filled many a cabin with the wailings of widows and orphans, yet he uttered no word of complaint even under the smitings of his own terrible affliction; nor did he, in his report of the event to the proper authorities, allude to his own services on the occasion. His was a noble, generous soul, always as deaf to the voice of flattery as to the suggestions of jealousy.

The disastrous battle at the Blue Licks spread a pall of gloom over Kentucky, and at the same time elicited a war-cry, vehement with the hot breath of vengeance, that awoke responsive echoes every where in that deep forest land. The settlers yearned to be led against the murderers of their friends and kindred, and an appropriate leader soon appeared. Early in September George Rogers Clarke, who had been commissioned a brigadier, assembled a thousand mounted riflemen at the mouth of the Licking River, crossed the Ohio, and, under the guidance of Simon Kenton, who commanded a company, pressed forward toward the Indian towns on the Sciota. Boone was with Clarke, a friend and prudent counselor, for he knew the intricacies of the way toward the scene of his long captivity a few years before.

The Indians were at old Chillicothe, celebrating their recent victory with horrid rites, when the Kentuckians approached. Terror seemed to give the savages wings. They fled toward Detroit in great confusion, and Boone entered the arena of his former captivity as a victor. The lash of severe chastisement immediately followed. Five villages and numerous corn-fields and orchards were laid waste. The Sciota towns were wiped from the face of the earth, and the power of their inhabitants was crushed in a day. The work was thoroughly done; and early in November the expedition returned to Kentucky, having secured forever the peace of that domain. As they rode slowly down the slope on which a part of Cincinnati now stands, Captain M'Cracken, then dying from the effects of a wound in his arm, proposed that they should all enter into an agreement that, fifty years from that day, the survivors should "meet there and talk over the affairs of the campaign." On the 4th of November, 1832, quite a large number of the survivors met there. The forest had disappeared, and a city of twenty-five thousand inhabitants occupied its place. Boone had then lain in his grave a dozen years, but Simon Kenton was yet among the living.

The broken-spirited Indians came no more in hostile bands to disturb the settlers in Kentucky, and Boone was permitted thenceforth to turn the strong current of his energies into the channels of peaceful life. Emigration poured a living flood over the land, no longer "the Dark and Bloody Ground." Not less than twelve thousand new settlers entered the country in the years 1783–'84, and soon the arts and blandishments of civilization began to mould society into forms ill-suited to the free spirit and uncultivated taste of the Pioneer, who disliked all conventionalities that interfered with personal freedom in speech and action. And the same year when the battle at the Blue Licks and the destruction of the Sciota towns occurred, Virginia had given courts of law and all their complicated appendages to Kentucky; and the new empire, whose germ was planted by Daniel Boone, rapidly blossomed. Boone himself appeared disposed to lay aside the rifle for the hoe; and upon a rich little farm he dropped the sweat of his brow, and gave his family hope that his wanderings were at an end. And so they might have been had justice ruled. But, alas! the cupidity of man often makes him the blind creature of expediency, grinding in the prison-house of his lusts; and the hand that gives him bread to-day is spurned to-morrow with the bitter words, "I know you not."

BOONE FIGHTING OVER THE DEAD BODY OF HIS SON.

Boone was soon made to feel the woes of such ingratitude and the oppressions of law. He could have endured the former, but, like the Leatherstocking, he could never see the wisdom nor the justice of the procedures of the courts of law. They always appeared to his simple nature like wicked instruments of wrong; and when they actually deprived him of his lands and left him, on the sunset side of the hill of life, without the possession in fee of a spot of ground sufficient for his grave in all Kentucky, like the Leatherstocking he turned his back upon civilization and its

"wasty ways," and with his dog and gun went into the deep wilderness. It was this, and not a misanthropic spirit that shuns social life, that made Boone leave Kentucky for the wilds beyond the Mississippi; and therefore the poet peer of England, who has spoken so lovingly of him, did him injustice when he wrote,

"'Tis true he shrank from men, even of his nation;
When they built up unto his darling trees,
He moved some hundred miles off, for a station
Where there were fewer houses and more ease."

Kentucky became a sovereign State of the confederacy in June, 1792, and at that time Daniel Boone was dispossessed of his farm. Some speculating Shylock had taken advantage of the law's blind technicalities and the Pioneer's simplicity. Boone had neglected to avail himself of some necessary forms of law, and his land, daily becoming more and more a valuable estate as emigration poured in and the Commonwealth increased in population, was taken from him by the talons of legal process, and he was left poor. In all that region first trodden by his foot, where half a million of people then flourished, Boone, at the age of almost sixty years, owned not an acre of the soil. And Simon Kenton, the brave pioneer, was for twelve months imprisoned upon the spot where he built his first cabin and planted his first corn. His body was taken for debt upon the covenants to lands which he had given away!

Indignant at the treatment he had received, Boone left Kentucky forever. Poor, and growing old, he went to Virginia, where he had been honored with the confidence of the powerful; but his services were no longer needed, and the powerful were willing to forget him. With his faithful wife, he seated himself near the Great Kanawha, and there he was soon disturbed by his dusky foe. But the victories of Wayne over the Western tribes soon spread peace on the frontier, and the Pioneer was toiling there for bread when light from the then far West broke in upon him. His son, Daniel M. Boone, animated by his father's spirit, had gone into the Spanish domain of Louisiana, beyond the Mississippi, and sent back words that cheered the heart of the Pioneer. Other men who had been in that region told him of the abundance of deer, buffalo, beaver, and otter, in the beautiful country now known as Missouri, and the fire of his old hunting spirit was kindled. They told him also of the great simplicity of the Spanish laws, the honesty and kind-heartedness of the people, and the facilities for procuring as much land as a man needed, without the danger of losing it by the impositions of legal chicanery. This touched the old man's heart, and he resolved to leave the dominions of civilized life, and once more enjoy the freedom of the wilderness and the simplicity of nature in her pristine beauty. Accordingly, in 1798, he left Virginia, accompanied by his devoted Rebecca, who, though growing old in years, was strong in love for her husband, a woman's fortitude, and a woman's noble courage and devotion. They drove their whole stock of cattle through the forests along the Ohio and Mississippi in the midst of many perils, and early in June they were at a resting-place in the wilderness forty-five miles above St. Louis. There, in the present St. Charles County, Missouri, the aged Pioneer pitched his tent and built a rude log cabin, and there he dwelt in peace and safety several years.

At the time in question St. Louis was a Spanish military post, and was considered next to New Orleans in importance. The Lieutenant-Governor gave Boone a most cordial welcome, and assured him that he should receive ample provision for himself and family. The Spanish authorities justly considered such men an acquisition to the territory. Boone was presented with a large tract of land, and on the 11th of July, 1800, he was commissioned Commandant of the St. Charles district, in which he resided.

In his new home the Pioneer found that freedom of action and simplicity of social life that he so much loved. There were few and simple laws, and these found willing subjects in the people. They had neither king, legislative assembly, judges, jurors, lawyers, nor sheriffs. The Commandant of a district and the parish priests were the administrators of justice, and adjudicated satisfactorily all disputes among the inhabitants. Having many things in common, occasions for disputes were few. Their flocks and herds, their swine and ponies, all grazed upon the same common prairie, and there were few inclosures to denote individual possession. The people were frank, generous, open-hearted, unsuspicious, and joyous; and at St. Louis, the most densely populated region of the domain except New Orleans, there were but two door-locks —one upon the little prison that seldom had a tenant, and the other upon the Government House.

Such was the society in which Daniel Boone planted his new home, and fondly hoped to pass the remainder of his days in peace. He tilled the soil, and occasionally, feeling the old restless spirit of the chase stirring within him, he would go upon long hunting excursions with his rifle and pack-horses, but not without anxiety on the part of his family, for old age was coming on apace, and the perils of the wilderness were more fearful than when his sinews were lithe. Notwithstanding his eyes were becoming dim, and the enlargement of the sight of his rifle would not suffice to give him his wonted expertness in its use, these hunting excursions were fruitful of pecuniary gain, for St. Louis mart often saw the horses of Colonel Boone heavily laden with the spoils of the trap and the chase. And these gains enabled the old man to perform a pious act of duty, the consummation of which had long been among his most earnest aspirations. The costs of litigation concerning his lands in Kentucky had involved him in debt—honest debt—and he had promised his neighbors and friends who loaned him money that he would repay them. Years rolled away, and that promise remained unre-deemed, for his inability to meet his pledge seemed to increase with his years. Now his trusty rifle had given him means, and once more the noble Pioneer, bowed with age, and his head hoary, appeared at Boonesborough. There all was changed, and Boone felt like a stranger from another sphere in the very domain that he had given to the prosperous people who now inhabited it. But these things did not disturb him. His mission had nothing to do with changes in men and things. It was a duty enjoined by commands of conscience concerning the Past. He sought out his old creditors, took the word of each for his statement concerning the Pioneer's indebtedness, paid every dollar, and with hardly a coin in his pocket he shouldered his rifle and started for his home in Missouri, happy in the consciousness that no man in all the world could reproach Daniel Boone for dishonesty.

But his paradise beyond the Mississippi was soon disturbed by intruders. That land had passed from the dominion of Spain to that of France, and by another change to that of the United States. The Federal laws, with all their complications, were extended over Louisiana, and once more Boone found himself perplexed by the intricacies and shadows of written law. His office of Commandant of St. Charles passed away like the morning dew, and was no more known. Yet he felt that his land—a free gift and fairly deeded—would never be taken from him, because that gift had been bestowed, and the deed given, before the United States held title to the territory. So, heeding but little the influx of emigration and the onflowing tide of civilization that swept past his home, he went frequently far, far up the Missouri and its tributaries to catch beavers and otters, and to shoot deer and buffaloes.

On one of these occasions "he took pack-horses," says his biographer and personal friend, "and went to the country on the Osage River, taking for a camp-keeper a negro boy about twelve or fourteen years of age. Soon after preparing his camp and laying in his supplies for the winter, he was taken sick, and lay a long time in camp. The horses were hobbled out on the range. After a period of stormy weather there came a pleasant and delightful day, and Boone felt able to walk out. With his staff (for he was quite feeble) he took the boy to the summit of a small eminence, and marked out the ground in shape and size of a grave, and then gave the following directions. He instructed the boy, in case of his death, to wash and lay his body straight, wrapped in one of the cleanest blankets. He was then to construct a kind of shovel, and with that instrument and the hatchet, to dig a grave exactly as he had marked it out. He was then to drag the body to the place and put it in the grave, which he was directed to cover up, putting posts at the head and foot. Poles were to be placed around and above the surface; the trees to be marked, so that it would be easily found by his friends; the horses were to be caught, and the blanket and skins gathered up; and then he gave some special instructions about the old rifle, and various messages to the family. All these directions were given, as the boy afterward declared, with entire calmness, and as if he was giving instructions about ordinary business." But the strength of the Pioneer increased, and, breaking up his camp, he returned home.

Again Daniel Boone became landless. A commission was appointed to inquire into the validity of claims to land in Louisiana granted by the action of the Spanish Government; and at the close of the year 1810 that commission decided that Boone's title was not good. So, at the age of seventy-six years, he was again left without a solitary acre of ground among the millions that lay uncultivated in the Mississippi Valley to which he could give a clear title-deed! It was hard, indeed, and most men, in like circumstances, would have murmured at their lot. But the old Pioneer, accustomed to vicissitudes, was patient and hopeful. He yet believed in Kentucky; and with a beautiful faith he sent a memorial to the Senate of that State in 1812, asking the voice of the Legislature in his behalf when he should petition the Federal Congress to confirm, by special act, his title to ten thousand acres of land in Missouri, given him by the Spanish Government. A prompt response was given, in language that fell gratefully upon the ear of the old Pioneer. "Taking into view," it said, "the many eminent services rendered by Colonel Boone, in exploring and settling the Western country, from which great advantages have resulted, not only to this State, but to his country in general, and that, from circumstances over which he had no control, he is now reduced to poverty, not having, so far as appears, an acre of land of the vast territory he has been a great instrument in peopling; believing, also, that it is as unjust as it is impolitic that useful enterprises should go unrewarded by a government where merit confers the only distinction; and having sufficient reason to believe that a grant of ten thousand acres of land, which he claims in upper Louisiana, would have been confirmed by the Spanish Government had not said territory passed, by cession, into the hands of the General Government;" it was therefore resolved, that the Kentucky Senators in Congress should be requested to use exertions to procure a proper grant of land in that territory to Boone.

Congress hesitated, and at length, in February, 1814, that body, with niggardly economy, gave him eight hundred and fifty acres out of the millions that might have been spared. And the words of the report which recommended this paltry gift were conceived in as mean a spirit. They asserted that "the petitioner is in old age, and had, in early life, rendered his country arduous and useful services." "This," says a late writer, "is about as little as could decently be said. Contrast it with the swords voted and thanks bestowed on those who have flourished in some brilliant engagement, not worthy to be named, for real endurance and danger, with the siege of Boonesborough, where horrid torture awaited defeat. Contrast the eight hundred acres with the tens of thousands lavished on some scheme of favorite partisans!" He then adds: "Never mind—they have perpetuated in marble, in the great dome of the Capitol, a scene in his life that never existed!

"'Seven cities claim old Homer, dead,
Through which the living Homer asked his bread!'"

While the question of his claim was pending in Congress a great sorrow was laid upon Boone. His faithful wife, who had shared his fortunes and all of life's vicissitudes for nearly sixty years, sickened and died. It was a dreadful loss for the old man—in intensity, the sum of all his past griefs—and he wept over her coffin as a young lover weeps over that of his affianced. She had ever been faithful and true; and with her the Pioneer buried all his best earthly affections. He left his own cabin, and took up his abode with his son, Major Nathan Boone (who died in 1856); and when, in 1815, peace with Great Britain made the forests less dangerous—for the Indians, whom he could no longer fight, were pacified—he again penetrated the deep wilderness in search of game. When almost eighty-two years of age he made a hunting excursion with only two men, near the mouth of the Kansas River, in the vicinity of Fort Osage, a hundred miles from his dwelling. Such was his earnest desire to be buried by the side of his beloved Rebecca that, on all of these occasions, he took with him a companion bound by a written agreement, that, wherever he died, that companion was to convey his body to his friends, to be buried with his wife upon the eminence overlooking the Missouri.

At about this time Mr. Harding, an eminent artist, visited the Pioneer in his dwelling on the Missouri, for the purpose of painting his portrait, by order of the General Assembly of Missouri. He found him, he said, "in a small, rude cabin, indisposed, and reclining on his bed. A slice from the loin of a buck, twisted round the rammer of his rifle, within reach of him as he lay, was roasting before the fire. Several other cabins, arranged in the form of a parallelogram, marked the spot of a dilapidated station. They were occupied by the descendants of the Pioneer. Here he lived in the midst of his posterity. His withered energies and locks of snow indicated that the sources of his existence were nearly exhausted." That portrait was the only one ever painted of the old Pioneer. No doubt it is a faithful picture of the form and features of Boone as they then appeared to the artist; but, according to contemporary description, it gives us but faint outlines of the noble head of the Pioneer in his best days. His forehead was high and broad; his hair dark and profuse; his eyes blue, clear, and mild; his lips thin and compressed; and his countenance thoughtful and serene, indicating a mind not at all in unison with the restlessness and activity that distinguished him. In person he was not remarkable. He was five feet ten inches in height, and of robust and powerful proportions. His manners were simple, and by no means unrefined. His costume was generally, as we have described it, a hunting shirt, buckskin breeches, and moccasins, and his rifle was his constant companion.

Death came to Daniel Boone on the 26th of September, 1820, when he had reached the age of more than eighty-six and a half years. It came to him in the form of a bilious fever, that entered the residence of his son-in-law, in Flanders, Calloway County, Missouri; and there, in sight of the great river whose waters flow from the eastern slopes of the Rocky Mountains, he was buried, by the side of his wife. The Legislature of Missouri was then in session; and when intelligence of his death reached them the members voted an adjournment for the day, and also that they would each wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

For five-and-twenty years the remains of the Pioneer rested in the soil where it was first inhumed. Then the Legislature of Kentucky, with filial reverence for the founder of the State, decreed that the coffins of Boone and his wife should be brought from the land of their exile and deposited in the public cemetery at Frankfort, the capital of the State. "There seemed to be a peculiar propriety in this testimonial of the veneration borne by the commonwealth for the memory of the illustrious dead," says Collins; "and it was fitting that the soil of Kentucky should afford the final resting-place of his remains whose blood in life had so often been shed to protect it from the fury of savage hostility. It was as the beautiful and touching manifestation of filial affection shown by children to the memory of a beloved parent; and it was right that the generation who were reaping in peace the fruits of his toils and dangers should desire to have in their midst, and decorate with the tokens of their love, the sepulchre of this primeval patriarch, whose stout heart watched by the cradle of this now powerful commonwealth, in its weak and helpless infancy, shielding it with his body from all those appalling dangers which threatened its safety and existence."

Having obtained the consent of the surviving relatives of the Pioneer for the removal of the remains, a committee, charged with the execution of the will of the Legislature, appointed the 13th of September, 1845, as the day when public funeral honors should be paid to the illustrious dead, and their remains be deposited in the bosom of Kentucky. The events of that day will ever form an interesting page in the annals of the State. On that occasion historic men—men whose names will never be forgotten while the chronicles of our republic are preserved—gathered around the coffin of a more eminent historic character, and bore it to the grave. The pall-bearers were fitly chosen from among the elders and the honored men of the commonwealth. At their head stood Richard M. Johnson, the brave soldier and eminent civilian, who had won military renown in battle, and been honored with the second office in the gift of the nation. There, too, was the venerable General James Taylor, an early pioneer, and then seventy-six years of age; and Captain James Ward, whose apparently charmed life affords some of the most remarkable subjects of tales of adventure with the Indians with which the history of the West abounds. By his side was the venerable General Robert B. M'Afee, the pioneer, the soldier, and the historian; and the remainder were men of somewhat less renown, but none the less honored where they were known and appreciated. These were Peter Jordan, Walter Bullock, Thomas Joice, Landon Sneed, Major T. Williams, William Boone, all of Kentucky, and John Johnson, of Ohio.

Thousands of people had gathered from all parts of the State to participate in the solemn funeral rites. A procession was formed, consisting of military companies, Masonic and other societies in regalia, and a great number of citizens on horseback and on foot, making the line more than a mile in length. The broad grave for the two coffins was dug in a lovely shaded hollow near the banks of the Kentucky River, and around it the multitude gathered. The religious ceremonies were performed by the Rev. Mr. Godell, of the Baptist Church, and were followed by an oration by the Hon. John J. Crittenden, the able representative of Kentucky in the Senate of the United States, who had been chosen for the grateful service. When the closing prayer had been offered, and the benediction pronounced, the coffins were lowered into the grave, and over them was piled a mound of earth—yet the only monument that marks the spot where the noble Pioneers are buried. The green sward and the lovely wild-flowers flourish there with every return of summer; and to that beautiful, quiet spot, beneath the shadows of wide-spreading trees, many a pilgrim has since stood, and mused upon the wonderful events in the life of DANIEL BOONE.

"That life," says Governor Morehead, in his eloquent address in commemoration of the first settlement of Kentucky, "is a forcible example of the powerful influence which a single absorbing passion exerts over the destiny of an individual. Born with no endowments of intellect to distinguish him from the crowd of ordinary men, and possessing no other acquirements than a very common education bestowed, he was enabled, nevertheless, to maintain, through a long and useful career, a conspicuous rank among the most distinguished of his contemporaries; and the testimonials of the public gratitude and respect with which he was honored after his death were such as are never awarded by an intelligent people to the undeserving. He came originally to the wilderness, not to settle and subdue it, but to gratify an inordinate passion for adventure and discovery—to hunt the deer and buffalo—to roam through the woods—to admire the beauties of nature; in a word, to enjoy the lonely pastimes of a hunter's life, remote from the society of his fellow-men. He had heard with admiration and delight Finley's description of the country of Kentucky, and high as were his expectations he found it a second Paradise. Its lofty forests—its noble rivers—its picturesque scenery—its beautiful valleys—but, above all, the plentifulness of 'beasts of every American kind'—these were the attractions that brought him to it.

"He united, in an eminent degree, the qualities of shrewdness, caution, and courage, with uncommon muscular strength. He was seldom taken by surprise; he never shrunk from danger, nor cowered beneath the pressure of exposure and fatigue. In every emergency he was a safe guide and a wise counselor, because his movements were conducted with the utmost circumspection; and his judgment and penetration were proverbially accurate. Powerless to originate plans on a large scale, no individual among the pioneers could execute with more efficiency and success the designs of others. It is not assuming too much to say, that without him, in all probability, the settlements would not have been upheld, and the conquest of Kentucky might have been reserved for the emigrants of the nineteenth century."

Such was Daniel Boone, the providential instrument of God in opening a pathway for civilization beyond the Alleghany ranges. We behold him leaving the banks of the Yadkin, an obscure hunter and adventurer. We see him dying, as he had lived during a long life, in a rude cabin in the wilderness, possessing no knowledge of the great world drawn from books, leaning trustfully upon the Indian's simple faith in the power and benevolence of a Great Spirit, and wrapped in a mantle of noble honesty, impenetrable to every wicked instrument of deceit and fraud that would fain hide beneath it. We behold that man of the Solitudes honored after his death with ovations of which old conquerors would have been proud, and his memory cherished in human hearts, in song and story, as the PIONEER and the FOUNDER OF AN EMPIRE.

THE WATER OF EL ARBAÏN.

O'ER wide Arabian deserts toiling slow,
With heat and travel spent,
With fever parched, our zemzemieh low,
Day after day we went,

Till now at Sinai's granite foot we lay;
The noontide sun beat sore;
Then we arose and took our weary way
Through sands and flints once more.

Close was the rugged valley, dry and bare,
Walled in with adamant,
Whose sides, reverberant with blinding glare,
Hurled back each sun-dart slant.

Yet onward still with trembling limbs we trod,
As erst the chosen flock,
And saw where legend saith their prophet's rod
Had cleft the eternal rock.

But thence, alas, no crystal streams now rolled
The thirsty soul to bless!
Alone remained of all those marvels old
The fiery wilderness.

At length, with blackened lip and bloodshot eye,
Scorched by the Simoom's breath,
I turned in anguish toward the brazen sky
And prayed for drink or death!

Then darkness gathered o'er my swimming sight,
Fast whirled the dizzy brain,
And the hot fever-throb with fuller might Coursed through each bursting vein.

Still to the fainting pilgrim words of cheer
The sons of Ishmael spake;
Told of a well of living water near,
That deathly thirst to slake;

And pointed toward a verdant garden-close
Within the vision's scope,
Where El Arbaïn's shattered arches rose
On Horeb's blasted slope.

There, pillowed soon beneath that welcome shade,
I heard the fountain's drip,
Then felt the o'erflowing cup of coolness laid
Against my burning lip.

Oh! never juice drawn from the choicest vine,
Whose favored root is fed
At the pure sources of the boasted Rhine,
Or oldest river's head;

Nay, not Valhalla's honeyed cup so rare,
By souls of heroes quaffed;
Not old Olympian nectar might compare
With that divinest draught.

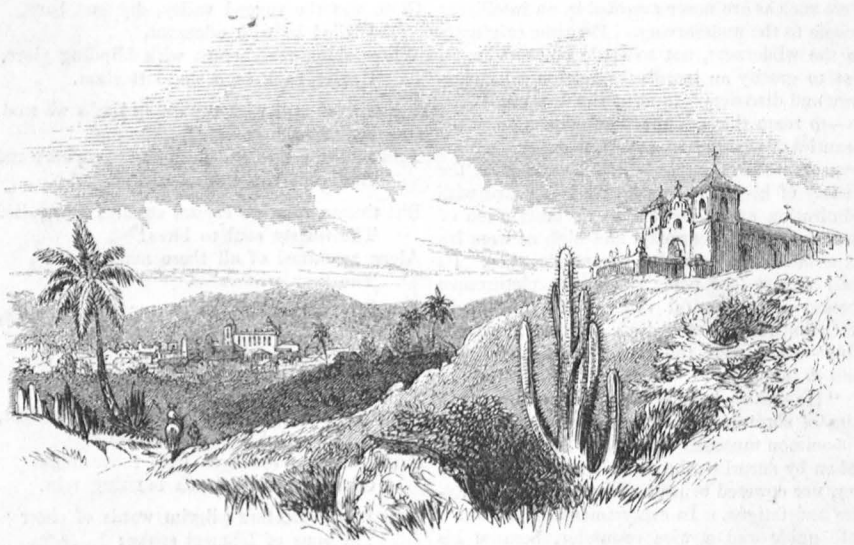
Cold as the ice-born flood from Northern steep,
Clearer than Indian wave,
Sweet as Nepenthe, drowning care in sleep,
A second life it gave!

O quickening fount! may thy bright currents roll
In everlasting flow,
And on the latest wanderer's fainting soul
A blessing like bestow!

Know too, O mortal! thou whose rougher way
Lies through a world of sin,
Without, the deadly arrows of its wrath,
Its fever fire within—

When sorrow, doubt, despair assail thy life
Till thy crushed heart confess
It fain would choose before such bitter strife
The grave of nothingness—

A well-spring, whose high source is heaven, doth
Upon thy travail sore; [wait
There drink, and thou shalt rise as re-create,
Nor thirst forever more!



CITY OF COMAYAGUA.—CHURCH OF CALVARIO.

A VISIT TO THE GUAJIQUERO INDIANS.

WE arrived in Comayagua, the capital of Honduras, on the afternoon of a bright Saturday in May, and through the intervention of our friend, Don Leon, were at once installed in the vacant episcopal palace—a fine building facing the Grand Plaza, close to the cathedral. It was the beginning of the rainy season, and a morning shower had rendered the air cool and grateful, laying the dust, and new-washing the houses, so that Comayagua appeared to us by far the freshest and most comfortable city we had yet visited in all Central America. Situated in a broad plain, elevated two thousand feet above the sea, and surrounded by a cincture of high mountains, it has all the conditions of natural beauty and salubrity, and combines the resources of the tropics and the temperate zone. The pine-tree and the palm here flourish side by side, and one may sit under the shadow of the orange and lemon trees in his court-yard and watch the wheat fields billowing in the wind on the slopes of the neighboring mountains. Nor is the town itself without its interior pretensions and interest. The cathedral is a fine specimen of the old semi-moresque style, which prevails throughout Central America. It is most substantially built, roof and all, of solid masonry. Its façade is profusely decorated with the symbols of the Catholic faith, and grim saints and apostles frown down on the heretic from highly ornamented niches, rising above one another, tier on tier. The interior is imposing enough in itself, but is marred in its effect by a lavish display of tawdry finery, draped on the walls and around the columns which support the roof. Some of the altars of carved wood are nevertheless very elaborate and beautiful, and attest a former, if not existing, high skill in this branch of art. There are a number of ancient paintings on the walls, but they are too much obscured by age, and the interior of the cathedral is far too dark, to admit of their merits being discovered.

The cathedral, however, is not the only structure of pretension in Comayagua. The church of La Merced is of large size, and is distinguished by the elaborate tomb of an early bishop built against its side, and by a monument of fine proportions in the centre of the Plaza in front. This was raised in a fit of loyalty under the crown, in honor of some one of the Spanish monarchs; but, on the Independence, the inscription was defaced, the royal symbols removed, and it is now supposed to commemorate the Independence itself. Until the abolition of capital punishment in Honduras it was not without a practical use, for criminals condemned to be shot were seated at its base, which still bears abundant scars of the fatal bullets.

The day following our arrival was not only a Sunday, but a fiesta or feast day. I do not remember what festival was celebrated, but it was one which has a peculiar significance to the Indians living on the plain and in the neighboring mountain villages. On this occasion it is their custom to come to the capital, and go through a variety of singular ceremonies, in which none of the whites are expected to participate, and which are essentially aboriginal in their character. They began to gather early on the afternoon of Saturday, and we passed great numbers of them on our way to the city, each carrying a little bundle of food and a gourd of chicha. Like all the other Indians of Central America, they stepped aside on our approach, and uncovered their heads while we passed—a token of re-

Boone Daniel - Frontiersman
The famous Pioneer hunter of Kentucky

DANIEL BOONE.

DANIEL BOONE, the pioneer hunter of Kentucky, was born in Bucks County, Pennsylvania, in February, 1735. His grandfather was an English emigrant, who came to America with his wife from the county of Devonshire, which furnished so much good blood to the New World. He settled in Bucks County, bringing with him, it is said, his family of eleven children. Of these, Squire Boone was the parent of the subject of our sketch. We read of his removing from the district, shortly after his son's birth, to the frontier hardships of Berks, the distance between the Delaware and the Schuylkill, sufficient, in that day, to make a frontiersman of the young Daniel. The woodland influences were as fresh there then as we can find them thousands of miles away in our own time. A simple, hardy population lived face to face with nature. The schoolmaster had, indeed, penetrated to the spot with his elements of knowledge imparted to shock-headed urchins in a rude log-house, but the Mighty Mother without, in wood and fields, and mountains, was the great teacher. The young Boone learnt what was to be taught of reading, writing, and arithmetic from his unnamed preceptor, and an infinite deal more for the purposes of his life in habits of hardihood, prudence, and skill in the forest sports and occupations.

When he was at the age of eighteen, the family removed to the remote north-western corner of North Carolina. His father settled on the banks of the Yadkin, and the son pursued with him the life of a farmer. The youth now took to himself a wife of the daughters of the land, Rebecca Bryan, destined to share with him many a mishap and triumph of the frontier.

It is curious to read of the motives which, it is said, induced Boone to look farther into the wilderness. The habits of North Carolina—it was exactly a hundred years ago—were even then, it seems, getting too luxurious for an unsophisticated lover of freedom, like Boone. We might smile at the picture drawn of this early aristocracy by his biographers, of its signs of wealth which, perhaps, in the luxury of our own day would be accounted little better than poverty, did we not remember that the principle is the same, though the means of its exhibition has relatively changed. Labor, we are told, was ceasing to afford an honorable support to the white man; slaves were on the increase, and certain Scotch merchants were pompously ruling the day with their equipage and expense under the patronage of the colonial court. Lawyers, too, began to abound as the country became more prosperous, and more than once in the history of our infant communities, when trade and finance were badly regulated, this gentry became, as in North Carolina at the time of which we are writing, objects of odium. Boone had a great distaste for the profession, though the bent of character which inflamed this dislike of the craft, must have tended to keep him out of the way of it in the first instance. We can hardly think that all this, the Scotchmen and the lawyers included, could very seriously affect the life of a simple farmer and hunter on the Yadkin, if he chose to be quiet. Rather should we look to the unresting mania of the genuine backwoodsman, whose cry is ever onward, pushing the ever-receding West before him, through stream and over mountain, to the edge of the Pacific.

Boone soon found his way over the present boundaries of North Carolina, to the head waters of the Holston and the Rock Castle of Kentucky, a tributary of the Cumberland. It was at first a mere exploring tour, but it brought him far on the way towards the scene of his future adventurous exploits.

In 1769 the call comes in earnest to the backwoodsman from his friend, John Finley, the adventurous trader and pioneer, who told of the wonders of wood and field in the hunting-grounds of the Indians, on the banks of the Kentucky. The two friends had previously explored something of the region together; they now went in quest of a habitation. A month's travel, in the spring of the year, brought the little party of six forest rangers, dressed in the hunting-shirt and supplied with the usual accoutrements of the craft, to a mountain eminence on the Red River, a stream flowing into the Kentucky, whence, at the close of a day in June, they first saw the far-stretching vale watered by that noble stream. The promised land was before them. The scene lives in description, and is a favorite subject for the painter. It is one of the memorable incidents, the landmarks of American civilization. Boone was then thirty-four, the prime of a hunter's manhood, sinewy, robust, resolute; full of strength of mind and of limb. He needed all these qualities to take possession of the hunter's paradise, which lay outspread before him. All splendid castles in this world worth taking possession of are guarded by infernal dragons of some species or other. The griffins of the fertile, game-flown, game-traversed, blessed hunting-grounds of Kentucky, were savage beasts which Boone and his companions did not mind much, and still more savage Indians, whom they were compelled to respect. These native warriors had indeed no settled habitation there; it was the debatable "middle," "dark and bloody ground," roamed over in hostile collision by the tribes of the South and the North. So much the more formidable was it, perhaps, to the settler, who, whenever he encountered an Indian, would be pretty sure to meet him armed for the fight.

Boone and his party pursued their hunting and explorations through the summer and autumn till December, without meeting with an Indian. Then Boone and Stewart, one of his companions, were suddenly captured by a party of the savages on the bank of the Kentucky. After a few days of imprisonment, they effected their escape by night, and made their way, with difficulty, through the wilderness to the encampment, from which they had wandered. Their four associates were gone, to be seen no more in that quarter. Boone and his friend were left alone. Their ammunition now began to fail, and matters were looking serious, when they were surprised by the arrival of two men, one of whom turned out to be Boone's own brother, Squire, from North Carolina, bringing a welcome supply of powder and ball. It was well that he arrived, for shortly after, while Boone was out hunting with Stewart, the latter was picked off by an Indian, and scalped. The North Carolinian, also, who had accompanied Squire Boone, fell a prey to the perils of the region, and the two brothers were alone—a pair of Crusoes in the wilderness.

The winter was passed without interruption in their lodge, where they supported themselves by the chase, and clothed themselves, with hunter's craft, in the skins of the deer they slew. When spring came, the brothers parted, Squire towards the distant Yadkin in quest of supplies of ammunition, Boone to pursue his hunting alone, and solace himself as best he could in his solitary camp. For three months he was thus separated from human life. Boone had occasional suspicions of the presence of Indians during this time in his tourings about his Robinson Crusoe hut; but nothing of harm came of them. His brother reached him again at the end of July, with fresh supplies and horses, when they continued their explorations together, taking the range of the Cumberland River. They were, however, attracted anew to the Kentucky, which they resolved to make the scene of a permanent settlement. They consequently returned home, carrying what peltry they could, with the intention of bringing their families from North Carolina. "Daniel had been absent two years, during which time he had tasted neither bread nor salt, nor seen any other human being than his travelling companions and the Indians who had taken him prisoner."[1]

It was two years before the family arrangements were made for the exodus from North Carolina. Then, having disposed of his farm and property, in September, 1773, the two brothers, with their wives and children, set out on their patriarchal pilgrimage to the land of promise. They carried clothing and provisions on pack horses, and drove a herd of cows and swine to furnish refreshment by the way and stock their future settlement. They crossed the dividing ridge into Tennessee, and were on their way through Powell's Valley, where they were joined by a considerable addition of five families and forty men, to the Cumberland Gap, when the rear-guard, in charge of the cattle, was suddenly fallen upon by a party of Indians. Six of the whites fell in this attack; among them, Boone's youngest son, James. This saddening misadventure arrested the movement of the expedition, which now retired to the settlements on Clinch River, in Virginia. There Boone was summoned in June, 1774, by Governor Dunmore, to traverse Kentucky, to relieve a surveying party, which had penetrated the country from the Ohio. He performed this adventurous duty in a journey of sixty-two days, in which he travelled on foot eight hundred miles.

Having thus been introduced to the government, his next employment also was of an official character. The Indians northwest of the Ohio, led by the famous Cornstalk, were now showing themselves hostile on the Virginia frontier. A considerable force was sent against them, and a battle was fought at the junction of the Kanawha and the Ohio. Boone was appointed captain, and commanded three contiguous garrisons on the frontier. The war being ended, he returned to his family on Clinch River. The emigrants who had been arrested in transitu on their route, held themselves in readiness for the remainder of the journey. This was expedited by an arrangement made by Boone with a company formed in North Carolina for purposes of settlement, by which he was employed as their negotiator with the Indians, and surveyor of the route which lay between the Holston and the valley of the Kentucky. This company had reached this region, or its neighborhood, when they were attacked by a party of Indians, and several killed and wounded. The expedition, however, persevered in its plans, and on the first of April, 1775, commenced building a fort on the Kentucky River, to which the name Boonesborough was given. It was a substantial work of hewn logs, with adjacent houses protected by stockades, quite defensible against the Indians. Having made this preparation, Boone returned for his family, and brought them in safety to the spot. His wife and daughters, he claimed, were the first white women that ever stood on the banks of the Kentucky River.

The Indians did not relish the fort from the beginning. Though they made no onset at once, they were prowling about in the forest, watching their opportunity. In July, 1776, they succeeded in capturing a daughter of Boone, about fourteen years of age, who, with two female companions, ventured one afternoon in a canoe on the river. On the opposite shore they were caught by the Indians, who stealthily came out from the shrubbery on the bank, and turned their boat out of sight of the fort. Their shrieks were heard, but there was no other canoe at hand to overtake them. Boone being away, the pursuit could not be organized till his return in the evening. The next morning by daylight the trail was taken and pursued with difficulty, in consequence of the efforts of the savages at concealment. Thirty miles or more had been travelled, when they were overtaken at a halting-place, and so suddenly pounced upon that the girls were safely recaptured.

The land speculators and their followers seem to have become somewhat disheartened by this mode of life, leaving the camp and defence to Boone and his genuine pioneers. Matters were not mended by the outbreak of the Revolutionary War, when that species of savage warfare was put in force by the British on the frontier, which roused the manly indignation of Chatham in the House of Commons. There were several forts and stations in Kentucky, but the force of all of them was not large. One hundred effective men, we are told by Boone, defended Boonesborough, Harrodsburgh, and Logan's Fort.

Boone was out with a party engaged in procuring salt at the Lower Blue Licks, on Licking River, in January, 1778, when a considerable body of Indians fell upon him as he was away from the camp, and took him prisoner. He saw at a glance that they were too numerous to resist, and that the best policy for the safety of his unprotected friends at the fort was submission. He was taken, as pleasantly as could be expected under the circumstances at that season of the year, by the savages, to the Indian town of Old Chillicothe, across the Ohio, and in the following March was conducted to Detroit, where he was treated with kindness by the British commander, Hamilton. This officer would have ransomed him from the Indians, and dismissed him on parole, but the barbarians found their captive far too accomplished a woodsman, and too good a fellow to part with. He was led back to Chillicothe, and adopted by Blackfish, a chief of the Shawnees, in place of a deceased son and warrior. He knew his captors well, fell in with their notions, and bided his time.

Initiated into the mysteries of savage life, Boone ingratiated himself with the fraternity by his habits and obedience. He was allowed to hunt, but each ball and charge of powder was to be accounted for in game. He split the balls and saved some of the powder to lay up a stock of ammunition against the time when he should be free. He followed the Indians in their journeys to the Salt Springs, where he labored for them. One day, finding that they were preparing for a descent upon Boonesborough, he determined to escape and give warning. He had a hundred and sixty miles to travel, but he accomplished it in five days. He had some jerked venison with him, and shot a turkey on the way. Fortunately, when he reached the Ohio, a canoe was at hand, which carried him across the swollen river to Kentucky. He then soon reached the fort, where he was little expected. He was in fact supposed to be safe in British keeping in Canada. His wife had given up looking for him, and returned to North Carolina.

The warning was now given by Boone, and the fort put in order for the attack, which promised to be a serious one. To effect a diversion, Boone, with a small party, made a foray into the enemy's country, and put a superior number to flight. In September, the foe came, four hundred and forty-four Indians and a few Canadians, headed by Blackfish and Captain Duquesne; the latter for the British interest. The garrison was but sixty or seventy, but Boone determined not to surrender. He began, like a skilful commander, to gain time by a parley, while he got in the cattle and water for a siege. The British officers then proposed a treaty, which turned out to be an effort to entrap the negotiators, the chief men of the fort. Neither party being armed, the Indians grappled with their antagonists, but they had men who loved fight to deal with, and the contest was resumed from the fort. A little courage in storming might have carried it, but the besiegers preferred the safer arts of firing the roof and mining, in both of which they were disappointed. In fine, after nine days of this species of warfare, in which they had lost thirty-seven killed, Duquesne and his Indians took their departure. The result, of course, redounded greatly to the valor and skill of the defence and the excellence of the marksmen within the fort.

After this affair was over, Boone visited his family on the Yadkin. Looking to the settlement of the country in which he had labored, he mustered some twenty thousand dollars in paper money, with which to proceed to Richmond, to take out the necessary land warrants, of which he was unhappily robbed by the way. It was not fated that Boone should enjoy much fruit of his explorations. Fascinated, however, by the old scene, and undeterred by its toils or perils, he returned to Boonesborough in 1780. An incident which now occurred must have touched the heart of the old frontiersman to the quick. While returning from the Blue Licks with his brother, that companion of so many lonely privations and difficulties successfully overcome was killed by Indians lying in ambush, while he himself narrowly escaped their pursuit.

In the organization of the country which was now made by Virginia, which, it will be remembered, at that time exercised jurisdiction over the territory, Major Boone was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel for Lincoln County. The agitation of Indian fighting was kept up with various alarms. The history of Kentucky in that period, is the story of deadly encounters and hair-breadth escapes, of ingenious resources in warfare with a cunning and unscrupulous foe. One of the Indian acts of aggression was of more than ordinary scope, the attack by Simon Girty and his confederated bands of warriors upon Raddle's Station, just at the present Lexington. It was, however, met by craft equal to his own; and his forces suffered so, that he was obliged to raise the siege. Colonel Boone, with his brother, Samuel, and son, Israel, were at the head of the Boonesborough party, which joined the rest from different parts of the country in pursuit. They were entrapped in an ambuscade, when Boone, fighting valiantly, bore from the field in the retreat the body of his dying son. General Clark, the great military hero of Kentucky, then took the field in an incursion into the Indian country, across the Ohio, and drove the savages before him, burning their towns and desolating the region.

This was the last great movement of the war. Peace was declared, and Boone rested for awhile in his pacific hunting and farming pursuits. When Kentucky was admitted as a State, in 1792, Boone's old North Carolina pest, the lawyers, from whom he had migrated in his youth, swarmed with the claimants of land titles. His property was assailed; he did his best to defend it by the aid of counsel, but he was stripped, and again turned westward, first resting on a farm in Virginia, at the mouth of the Kanawha. He then made, for those days, a great stretch, to upper Louisiana, where he settled in the country back of St. Louis, in quest of the receding dream of his youth. He had members of his family already there, two sons and a son-in-law. He was received with favor by the Spanish authorities, and appointed commandant of the Femme Osage district.

Boone had a valuable grant of land from the Spaniards, the title of which, on the delivery of the country to the United States, as usual in his affairs of the law, was pronounced defective. He had neglected to take the necessary means to perfect it before the Spanish authorities. He appealed to Kentucky to aid his memorial to Congress, which listened to his request, and established his title to a thousand arpents of land in the Missouri district, where he had first settled.

His later years were passed with his family, in comparative ease and comfort, though sadly invaded by the death of his wife, who was taken from him in 1813, having followed his hazardous fortunes through youth, manhood, and age. After this, death and a grave by her side, were habitually in his thoughts. He prepared a coffin for his burial at a spot above the Missouri, and there his remains were interred. His death took place September 26. 1820.

Such was the life of Daniel Boone, the strong pioneer of the wilderness, chequered by many vicissitudes and some sad trials, but proceeding ever straight on to its mark. He was like many others whom we are accustomed to associate with a rough frontier mode of life, eminently simple and moderate in his habits and manners. He was quiet and reserved, fond of the solitude of the forest; averse from the arts and intrigues of civilized man. The fresh air, the open sky, the scented woods, his faithful gun, were all that he asked of the world. His delight was in the company of nature, with nothing poetical or peculiarly reflective about him, but in the simple consciousness of strength and manhood. The domestic affections, doubtless, divided with him those emotions. He lived with his family, and often for a long time saw few others. His virtues were allied to his temperance and sobriety. He worshipped truth and honor, and left behind him at his death the ideal of the genuine man of the woods, in love with his employments, an enthusiast, subduing by his manliness all the rough hardships of the scene in which he was placed.

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY.

Of that honorable band of South Carolinians, men of birth and fortune, who stood forth at the outset of the Revolution, no one brought more accomplishments or a better zeal to the cause than Charles Cotesworth Pinckney. He was of an old family in the province, dating from an ancestor who came from England toward the end of the seventeenth century. A descendant of the latter—the old colonial chief justice, Charles Pinckney, of repute in his day—married his second wife, the daughter of a British officer, and governor of Antigua, and became the father of Charles Cotesworth, who came into the world at Charleston, on the twenty-fifth of February, 1746. Thomas, who also afterwards became greatly distinguished in the military and civil history of the country, was his younger brother by several years. The father, whose position gave him the best opportunity to value a good education, was determined that his sons should be in the way of possessing whatever advantage it might afford. He, according to the custom of the wealthy in the country, sent his sons to England for instruction. So thoroughly indeed was the chief justice impressed with the importance of this foreign education, that he left directions in his will that it must be secured at any price before the return home of his children, even if a part of his estate were to be sold to pay the expense.

The outlay, whatever it may have been, was not thrown away upon inefficient instructors. We read of the preparatory training of Charles—he was seven years old when he was taken to England—for five years previous to his entering Westminster school, then under the charge of Dr. Markham, afterwards Archbishop of York, and of his proceeding thence to Christ Church, Oxford, where no less a person than Cyril Jackson, the sub-preceptor of that virtuous prince who became George IV., was his private tutor.

At Oxford, Pinckney had the good fortune, in view of his future profession, of listening to the law lectures of the famous commentator, Blackstone, then employed in the delivery of those famous discourses at the University, which, on their publication, were to create a revolution in the study of the law, smoothing the way to future students, of the thorny path hitherto trod only in the bewildering pages of Coke and the old crabbed fathers. The first volume of the lectures was not published till 1765. Before he was eighteen, Pinckney had taken copious
